It was a low, cold, dark chamber; the dying It was a low, look, dark chamber; the dying coals upon whosh hearth, with the poor dickering taper above starcely served for light amid the surrounding shadow. Near to the pitful fire, his form wasted by disease, his eye sunken and dimmed by the deadly spirit that sits in the wine cup, lay the mouraful remnants of what once had been the property rich in love; lay the mountful remnants of what once had been a man; a man rich in intellect; rich in love; rich in the respect and adpiration of his fellows; rich in the incedimable treasure of woman's affection. He had not fallen suddenly, but slowly, cautiously, had the subtly poison entered his soul. He tasted first to please his cheefful warm hearted friends; they extended the cup, and he did drink. Soon, madness entered his brain; poverty stood at his door disease came death threatened; station was gone; self-respect had flown; his jovial friends had deserted him; and there was but one heart in the wide world that cared for the hopeless inchrints. Yet there by his side, breathing consolation in his ear, something soothing his raffled spirit with gentleness, knelt that true and faithful heart, unshaken in its love, firm in its devotion, and steadfast in looking towards the Hills whence came its helps in the darkest and sore; time of Inced. An expression of ineffshie tenderness lighted up her pale and attenuated face has she spoke: "Repentance is baptism of the soil, and Mercy is the attribute of God. We shall in happy yet, my husband, and shall live to bleepthis lonely hour, which ushers in the New Year of our hopes." A smile illuminated the face of the pentient sufferer, and just then the Recording Angel, blotted out a written page of his tablets, leaving it pure and white as the snow of innocence.

I had looked upon the Book of the human Heart, and read the fearful lare written upon its spotted leaves. The lesson was terrible in the learning, and in memory inffaceble. The Recording Angel was still at my side. Sinking exhalsted belon him, I exclaimed, "Leave me not, with this awful power upon my spurit; this unlawful knowledge at my heart. It would be a living death to learn these leasons daily. I would stather walk among the dead, or meet a leper in my every path, then goze upon the naked soul of man." Thrones, Dominions and Powers, which uncoaringly hymn the melodies of Heaven.

I stood beside the Recording Angel, in the lofty half of a brilliant and stately mansion. Upon a luxuriant couch, drawn near a brightly burning fire and half buried among its crimeon cushions, reclined the form of a tair and delicate woman.—Herseyes were partly closed, but a deep frown had gathered upon her brow, and one hand clutched the rose drapery around, as if it held a deadly cnemy within its grasp. Invisible to her, we watched these throbs of mental agony, while the secrets of her imnost heart were laid bare before us spread out as upon a scroll, and read as with an eye of lightning.
