MEMORY OF THE DEAD.—How sacred the memory of the dead! we will not, cannot forget those whose affections were early en-twined around our hearts in the holy bonds of friendship. They may have died in a for-eign shore, far from home and friends, with no kindred spirit upon whom they might cast a farewell look, ere they entered the heavenly world, but they will live in our hearts, when we visit our familiar retreats, and meet not their smiling faces; we think of them, too, at the calm twilight hour, and at bright smiling morn they are not forgotten. The stranger who may lightly passover the grassy mound which covers them—will not disturb mound which covers them—will not disturb their repose. Their's is a sweet, a heavenly sleep: their's is a rest, which those can disturb. Calm be their sleep, and though though to them may cause a tear drop to fall, we will not call them back from their noble, pure home, to again mingle with, the vanities of earth, and again meet its trials. We will silently look tipon the turf that covers them—we will there plant the evergiteen and the thornless rose, as a partial tribute to their the thornless rose, as a partial tribute to their memory, and then leave the spot—perhaps forever; but while life and reason last, we an earnestness which he saw it was useless to resist. So, Emily, I will pass on to the announcement of my widowhood—when I went forth to the world a hypocrite in widow's weeds. My husband wrote to me three times during the first year of ourseparation, imploring me by every precious tie to permit him even by stealth to look once more upon the face of his child. To every entretty I returned a cold, stern, hard answer, and for all this I have dearly bitten the dust since .-The years sped on which return no more, and my child began to expand into a loveliness which was almost superhuman.—Strange as it may appear to you. I amin Strange as it may appear to you, I again learned to love my husband through his child. When she spoke to me it was her father's voice, every lineament was his, and I so loved my child that I again loved my husband through her. Strange inconsistency you may call this, but it is nevertheless true. I knew that he was alive, for reguency you may call this, but it is nevertheless true. I knew that he was alive, for regulafly every year I have received a small provision for our maintenance through unknown hands. This, with the little patrimony received from my father, enabled me to live far above want—actually affording many of the little luxuries of life. You little know how I have yearned to look once more tipon my husband's face. Oh Emily, I thought if I could but see him, all might be made up. I was prepared to humble myself in the very dust, that I might be taken back to his heart once more. I knew not where to direct even a letter to him, and like a poor condemned criminal I dared not make open inquiry: for in the dyes of the world I was a widow and my poor-child an orphan. So well have I played my part in hypocrisy, that no one has every dreamed of any husband's existence.

"I believe that I knew, and loved you, too, for nearly four years—and that brings me to nearly a widowhood of thirteen years."

Ic treasury, because it would be defiled by them. These thirty pieces of silver were employed to buy a field to bury strangers in, which was called The Field of Blood. This fatal and cursed silver is not, according to the legend, a common and ordinary coin. It had after the murder of Abel, his sons invented the Arts, those instruments and punishments of the passions of man, and Tuhalcam, the eldest son of Cain, discovered the art of cast ing metals. It was he who struck those thirty cursed pieces which at first paid the brothers of Joseph where they sold him to the Egyptian merchants, and which down through the ages, serving for, I know not howy many treasons and crimes, have reached at last,—the hands of Judas, for whose execrable perfidy they were the reward.—The mysterious predestination attributed to these pieces of silver, which passed thus from Cain to Judas,—this price of the blood of all the just—forged by the son of the murderer tipon carth—all this is great and heautiful; but this contains too, for nearly four years-and that brings by the son of the murderer upon earth-all me to nearly a widowhood of thirteen years. this is great and beautiful: but this contains I had almost outlived the hope of ever again also a great moral idea—for there are few seeing my husband, when about three weeks great poetical inventions which do not con-prove useful afterwards. We frequently recur during slumber to the subject that has most engressed its before, that has cost the most anxious deliberation : and it would be wonderful, indeed, if we did not sometimes dream usefully respecting it. Serviceable dreams are sufficiently rare in truth to excite no reasonable wonder, though beautiful ones are more common, and they are sometimes invested with an almost supernatural appearance-a something indescribable in our, waking moments seems to environ, like a halo of glory; fear and horfor also appear in extreme, stalking like colossal shadows through the changing scene. This would Ior her husband's death. The announce—tained in the last letter I wrote to you, twelve years ago, all would have been well; as it is, you sowed the seeds of your own unhappise.
