There, too, you recollect, was the brother. You watched his growth from helpless infancy. You led him out to study the boy's duties; you listened to the first desire he breathed to make himself famed. You remember his holy ambition, his unchecked ardor, his manly respect for himself and for the feelings of others. Or, if you be younger than he, you can recall his tender care of you, his kindness in teaching, his unselfish daring. Most of all, you think of the intimate communion of spirit there was with
