As remarked in a former article, his idea grew out of the teachings of Christianity. This religion extended itself, also very early into England. Cloisters and schools connected with them, were established like unto those on the continent, and produced subsequently similar effects. For we find, that while CHARLES the GREAT was prosecuting his work of opening schools throughout Rye, do his empire, peculiar events were leading to the same thing in England. The first sovereign of this country, who was influenced, to any considerable extent, with this idea, was Alfred the Great, who lived in the latter part of the 9th century. What an interesting train of reflections arise in one mind, in contemplating these two great historical personages-CHARLES and AEFRED.

Many with whom I was personally acquainted realized, for working men, snug little fortunes, while others were less fortunate. And while Madam Rumour publishes to the world the favorites of fortune, not one syllable is uttered about the disappointed Gold Hunter. FRED followed a succession of political commotions and storms, which destroyed what he had commenced. But neither the storms and serene sky lit it up more brilliantly than before. It was possible for political revolutions to destroy particular schools, but they could never slay that idea, which gave them birth, and which brought others into life, faster than they could be destroyed. The same intimate connection, which existed between Church and State on the continent, during this period, formed also the basis of civilization on the Island of the Anglo-Saxons. Hence we find that ALFRED rebuilt everywhere, not only the cloisters and schools, which the ruthless hands of harbarous invaders had destroyed, but that he did also the same thing in regard to-churches. Neither was he less interested in a well educated was he less interested in a well educated clergy than in able and learned officers of the civil government. An institution, established by the church at Rome for the purpose of the church at Rome for the purpose of the surviving Soldiers of these wars. by the church at Rome for the purpose of educating persons intending to labor in England, in the service of the church, received special favors from him. It is even recorded of him, that he had entertained the idea of Pottaville, April 17, 1852. translating the entire bible into the language of his subjects. But this was never accomplished by him; only one-half of the psalms were thus translated. The numerous schools and cloisters in England, like those on the continent, grew out of the teachings of Christianity. Those which existed previous to the time of Ar-FRED had been founded by the servants of the church themselves, and each bishop exercised a general supervision over all the cloisters within his bishopric. The authoricloisters within his bishopric. The authorty of these bishops was somewhat similar to those on the continent, extending, in many things, over into the prerogatives of the citings, over into the prerogatives of the citings and the citings are citings and citings are citings are citings and citings are citings and citings are citings are citings and citings are citings are citings and citings are cit vil authorities. A general religious sense pervaded all political movements, and every act, on the part of the State, was therefore controlled, to a considerable extent; by the church. This was particularly so in regard to the subject of education. But, in the course of time, the power of the State was absorbed by the authority of the church, which continued to assume more of the civil power ing season. Narch 27, 1852.
