territory of Austria is one-twelfth of the ter-ritory of Europe, its population is not more than one-sixth of the population of Europe, its inhabitants, according to the last census, amount to thirty-nine millions; which gives 164 persons to a square mile; while in the United Kingdom the population is as 225 to the square mile. In some considerable portions of the Austrian dominions this comparatively small population is perceptibly on the decrease; in no place does the yearly increase much exceed one per cent. At the same time, the number who die is in the proportion of one in twenty annually; while in this country, the deaths in proportion to the population, are about one in sixty. Why is it that the population of the territories of Austria is found to fall below the average population of the states of Europe to the extent of one-half? Why is it, also, that in a space covered by 10,000 in Austria, more than 500 people must die next year, while in

Mr. John Jebson, of Mold Green, near Hudwhich obtains through those countries, take of them. But as the paternal government which obtains through those countries, takes upon it to do every thing for the people leaving searcely, anything beyond the dullest routine of things to be done by them, we see at once where the fault must rest. In fact, confidence in the lamp itself is a philosophical mistake. Experience has proved that the lamp can neither be secured from occasional derangement nor accidents, and the obvious inference is that we must look to another principle for ensuring the satety of the miner. We have seen that explosions arise from the accumulation of carburretted hydrogen. Shall we ask, why are there accumulations of this noxions gas? or are they a necessity? The gas only escapes; its accumulation must be attributed either to neglect or want of means for dispersion.—Ventilation, as a remedy for these evils, may be considered under two aspects—one as being sufficient to prevent explosions; the other is the mine. But, perhaps, what is most to be deplored is the great ignorance that has hitherto prevailed as to the quantity of air remained for each of the above nursoess. be deplored is the great ignorance that has hitherto prevailed as to the quantity of air required for each of the above purposes.—
Every one who has practical experience has observed that in the best ventilated mines on much worse, even worse than in Austria—that is, that the deaths annually would prove to be even more than one in twenty. Now, the present principles, there is perhaps not more than one-third of the quantity that ought to be supplied. The consequence is, that to wards the latter part of the day the air has become so dense that its motion could scarcely be perceived, and in other instances so highly inflammable that explosions of the most fearful kind have been the result. The grand desideratum, then, is efficient ventilation.—This will consist in having a sufficient quantity of atmospheric air constantly supplied to the mine, and properly distributed or diffused through every part, so as effectually to neu-
