of prolonging the crank pin and attaching the coupling rod outside.

coupling rod outside. The line of pressure is brought directly from the piston rod to the most remote crank pin, without producing strain upon the inerinediate boxes. A pair of brass boxes and the fitting and attendance required for keys is saved. The weights of grank pins and of the parallel connecting rod is very much re-duced, and their disturbing action conse-quently diminished; it being well known that the internal disturbances in locomotives ire proportional to the weights of the recip-

The strains on the crank pins are also reduced in proportion as they are applied near-er the face of the wheel, and reversing sud-lealy there is, therefore, less danger of breaking the pins. The slip of the wheels, coupled by this connection, due to the obliguity of the con-necting rod at half stroke, is practically nothing. With a connecting fod 7 teet long be-tween centres, and having the joint 6 inches from forward crack pin, the slip of the back crack pin, with a 11 such crank, is 1-20 inch.
