important interaction of the day in the southers of iron making, will doubticative of pacultar interast to our retainers. . It is known that the ordinary process of manufacruring iron is both tedious and complicated. The ore is first note roasted, in under to de-oxydize it and to separate the subput; it is then cleaned and after wards "revived." in a blast futnace, when the metted mutal is drawn off in "piga." These cast-iron "piga" are subsequently broken up, re-heated and hammered, by convert them into "blooms." (inpure wrought iron) belore they are nade available in the valous processes of manufacture to which the metal is subject. All this costs time, labor and money: but Renton's patent does away with all the intermediate labor, and reduces the manufacture of wrought-iron direct from the ore to a single operation, that is the ore being properly calcined and ernalized into a granular state; the pitimit transformation from one state to the other, including all the idtermediate grades, is conducted in one furnace and with the all of only one fire. ed. "The sculptor, Mr. Washe, commenced cutting the wooden pattern on the 18th of September, 1852, and after working with much assiduity for a period of nearly twelve months, it was completed for the next process, which was the cutting of the model into 323 pieces. Accordingly, armed with a fine saw, the sculptor first cut off Mr. Clay's wooden coat tail; the lappels shared the ame fate ; both arms followed suit, and the limbs were again cut and slashed into numerous pieces by this anatomist of white pine statuary. There seemed to be no end to the outrageous desecration 'to which the poor effigy had to submit ; every button was whipped from the coat, and the pants and boots had to submit to being shorn away, as well as the ears, which were also cropped off. By the time all this cutting and slashing was finished, the poor statue looked
