Henry Clay's Opinion of Buchanan.

The St. Louis Intelligencer contains a political letter from Thomas H. Clay, the elder son of the late Henry Clay, touching his father's opinion of James Buchanan. He says that his father thought Buchanan weak, corrupt, and wanting, as Jackson had, in moral firmness. This is true. Henry Clay has left but one son to represent him. He is the half-wit fool, James H. Clay. The other sons of Mr. Clay possessed more firmness. The old James is fit for nothing except to worship the similitude dollar, and that he does by selling Ashland, and exhibiting as so much a head over his father's hair. The Buchanians are welcome to him.

From Kansas.

By way of St. Louis, we have reports from Kansas, that the army, headed by General Dodge, had all been disbanded, returned to their homes in Missouri, and being the exact account of their own friend and organ, the St. Louis Republican. That paper goes on to tell us, the counties in Missouri, that they may rest easy, viz., Howard, Saline, Cooper, and Franklin, may be passed off as the milites of the territory, though all officially known to be citizens of Missouri. Gov. Geary, who knew them to be the leaders, suffered them quietly to return. Major-General Dodge, however, had thrown a force of the U. S. Cavalry into the cities, arrested ninety of the Free Soilers, and drove the rest away. Such is the justice meted out to the contending parties in Kansas by a governor specially appointed to represent the views and policy of Mr. Buchanan.
