STRAN AND THE ELECTRIC TRLEGRAPH IS THE PAPAL STATES .- Those twin sisters of civilisation, progress and splightenment, have made their formal intres into the Papal States, and are gradually working a revolution for the better. Rome bows her head to the spirit of the age, and feels the palse of progress, beating in her old vains. New roads have been opened in various parts of the papal states, the port of Terracina has been enlarged, works of drainage have been people in both countries that there shall be no executed in the Pontine marshes. The marsh of Octin is now in the process of drainage. Agri. up their minds to accept any plan that shall culture has been encouraged and stimulated; and a commission of landed proprietors has been raised to consider a plan for the improvement of the susitary condition of the campagua, so as to make it a fine site for human habitations. Steam navigation has been introduced to some extent upon the Tiber; and the sharp whistle of the casape pipe is beard upon those long silent shores.

Stranger still, the snort of the iron horse now startles the schoes of the desolate Campagne.-From a station near the gate of Honorious, the rail cars start at appointed times, dash forth under the shadow of the Claudian aqueduct, and whirl the traveller to Frascati, Cicero's Tusculum. This road is to be extended to Naples. Another is meditated which shall connect Rome with Bologna and Anoona; and ere long the dreary waste between Bome and Civita Vecchia will be traversed by the locomotive. The light gentlemanly roply: wires of Morse's telegraph are seen springing from one broken arch to another of the Acqua Aurelia. And strangest of all is to stand amid the massive ruins of the Palatine, and perhaps from the remains of the balcony of the Cassard, look down into the Circus Maximus, the scane of the rape of the Sabine virgins, and find there a manufactory of gas, with its swart artisans, sending its futtering tongues of flame far over the yellow Tiber. The venerable darkness of the Biernal City is beginning to be shattered by this piercing and intrusive light; and now the fountains of St. Peters may be seen .--not merely under the pale glances of the stars,not merely under the sheeted splendor of the moon,-but with their loosening crystal illuminated by these floating artificial beams. How strange all this is ! Railroads and electric tale. graphs and gas lights in Rome ! what visions and memories and images are awakened by these words ! into what a shadowy past do they said the glange of the mind, swifter than the winged dressed in a little, brief authority. The appointwords which dart from point to point along these airy threads !

These things mayo Protestanize in a measure a least, priest-ridden Italy. It is too much to hope for, under a century at least. It will in
