and the "placked pigeon" staked his last dollar upon them.

"The last button on Gabe's cost, and I crer-. No, I'll be hamstrung if I do." He lost this too, and with as deep a curse as ever heard, he rose from the green board. The spartment was very spacious, and on the ground floor. There was only this one gaming table in it, and not many lookers on besides myself. Thinking the gaming was over, I turned to go out, but found the door locked and the key gone. There was evidently something in the wind. At all events, I reflected, in case of need, that the windows are not very far from the grounds I returned, and saw the winners dividing the spoil, and the poor shorn "greenhorn" leaning over the backs of their chairs, staring intently at the money: The notes were deliberately spread out, one after another. Those which the luser had staked were new, fresh from the press, he said, and they were sorted into a heap distinct from the rert,-They were two dollar, three dollar, and five dol lar notes, from the Indiana Bank, and the Bank of Columbus, in Obio.

"I say, Ned, I don't think these notes are good," said one of the winners, as he examined them ....

"I wish they weren't, and I'd crow," cried ou the loser, very chopfallen, at his elbow. This simple speech lulled the suspicions of the counter, and he resumed his counting. At last, as he took up, the last note, and eyeing it keonly, he exclaimed, is a most emphatic manner :-"I'll be hanged if they are genuine ! . They are forged 12 "No they ain't," replied the loser, quite as emphatically.

"A very opprobrious epithet was now hurled at the latter. He, without more ado, knocked down the speaker at a blow, capsized the table which put out the lights, and in the next instant, durted out of the window, whilst a bullet, fired from a pistol, cracked the pane of glass over his head. He had leaped into the small courtyard, with a wooden paling round it. The winners, dashed to. wards the door, but found that the "green one" had secured it.

When the three worthics were convinced that the door would not yield to their efforts, and when they beard their victim galloping away, they gave a laugh at the trick played them, and returned t the table.

"Strike a light, Bill, and let's pick up what. notes have fallen. I have nearly the whole lot in my pocket."

The light soon made its appearance. "What! none on the floor ? Capital! I think I must have them all in my pocket, then ;" saying which, he drew out the notes and laid them on the table.

"Fires and furies !/ These are the lorged notes The rateal has whipped up the other heap !". While all this was going on, I stepped towards the window, but had not stood there long before I heard the clanking hoofs of a horse beyond the paling, and a shout wafted into the room-"Sloped for Texas!"

The worst part of the story remains to be told. It was my horse on which the rogue was now galloping off.

COUNTRY lass, not long matried, was told by her husband to boil some eggi, and to "bhoyle 'em soft." He went out a while, and on his return they were boiling, but not ready. He waited long, and then shouted : "Are those eggs noan ready yet ?"

"Naw," said she, "they are not, for sitho, aw've hoyls 'em aboon a beawer, un this no softer yet." Now, he did care so much about this, but when bhoylt 'em aboon a beawer, un thir no softer yet." he saw her take the child's nightcap of its head
