There is another fact which puzzles the unthinking. It is this. Protection to American Industry always increases wages and diminishes the prices of products in a very short time. This is impossible, say the unthinking. We can, however, prove that such is always the effect of adequate protection, simply because when business is prosperous and wages are good, each man power produces less and consumes more, as stated before. This gives employment to all, and a demand is created not only for labor but for the products of labor. Then additional machinery is introduced to take the place of man power to supply the demand. This machinery doing the work of a large number of men guided by one or two, cheapens the products, and also requires more skilled labor ; and this de.' mand increases the wages of labor, while these increased wages give the ability toconsume, and create a demand for these in; creased products produced by this machinery treme modesty have kept back from the Amerat the reduced rates.
