The President and the People. [Philadelphia Press.]

President Garfield's Administration has had a stormy pathway during its short career thus far, but it has resolutely braved all of its difficulties and has made steady and triumphant progress. The clouds which suddenly loomed up about it were the more surprising because they had been little to presage such a tempest. Rarely has an Administration started out with a fairer prospect of peaceful progress. General Garfield's nomination had satisfied the independent sentiment of the country without dampening the enthusiasm of the regular party organization. During the canvass he had rallied a united party to his and taking things easy. cordial support, and he was elevated to the Presidency not merely through the force of party loyalty but with the intelligent and approving judgment of the nation. In organizing his Adsample: ministration he sought to preserve this established harmony by frankly consulting and respecting all the elements which had contributed to the common victory, and the first results gave hopeful promise of success.

But this prospect soon proved delusive. It very speedily appeared that there were leaders who would not be content with a fair recognition of all divisions, but who insisted upon grasping all power within their own hands. When the President undertook to be President, and without departing from his settled policy of just treatment for every portion of the party. assumed to exercise his rightful prerogatives according to his own judgment, he suddenly found himself facing war instead of peace. It was a struggle which involved not merely his own honor and dignity, but the constitutional principles of government and the freedom of the party from personal dictation. For more than a month the angry contest was waged against the President. To-day it is over except as defeated factionists may attempt to carry it into localities, and the Administration is stronger than before. It commands a more positive and aggressive popular support than when it entered upon its term. Then there was a general feeling of good will and of hopeful expectancy; now there is the vital enthusiasm aroused by manly actions and real public achievement. The President himself is personally stronger and has palpably gained in the public esteem.

The first and the obvious reason is the firmness and courage he has displayed in maintaining his position and defending his constitutional prerogatives. Perhaps this firmness was unexpected. It has been quite the fashion, while recognizing the great ability of General Garfield, to charge him with a want of backbone. He has been regarded as a man of splendid intellectual endowments, but as deficient in the decision and rugged strength which belongs to positive natures. If there was any ground for such an impression he has done very much to remove it. The truth is that This remarkable man had worked a statesman of his breadth and accomplishments is very apt to be misapprehended. He sees all sides of a question, and in balancing them against each other may seem to hesitate more to the other. than the man of narrow vision who sees only the one side, and obstinately follows it. But in the end he acts under the command of intelligent convictions and a deep sense of responsibility. General Garfield has shown both pluck and backbone, and he has gained in the public esteem both because he has been courageous and because his courage has been exhibited in the just cause of defending the integrity of the party and the honor of the Government against the assaults of autocratic claims. The people have seen too that the President has earnestly sought to be entirely fair, and that he has still preserved this equable Marietta. te nper under the grossest provocation. While resisting insolent pretentions he has not, on the other hand, permitted any section to be proscribed and punished. Even after the warfare upon him he has been careful to avoid giving any just ground of offense to his assailants, and this manifest fairness and firmness have greatly heightened his place in the public respect.

-The Treasury Department at Washington receives five per cent. bonds, for continuance under the 81 per cent. scheme, at the rate of over twenty-five million dollars per day, and this rate will probably continue during the week, so that the Secretary expects to receive nearly $200,000,000 by Saturday night. The holders of five per cents seem more willing to accept the 81 rate than the holders of sixes did, probably because the reduction in rate is so much less. The average interest rate of Government bonds now, premium considered, is about three per cent, and the 41s and 4s really yield less than that rate to the holders. Investors, while opposed to a three per cent, bond, will readily pay a premium on a 4 per cent. bond, only remedy peculiarly adapted to the which make it yield less than a 3 per many ills the sex is almost universally cent. bond would.
