to regulate the line of discounts to be allowed to the customers of a bank. It can no longer be borne that one man, whether from favor or for profit, shall be allowed to draw from a bank one hundred and fifty thousand dollars of loans, while the morehant, the manufacturer, the farmer, and the artisan is restricted to the smallest amount of oredit. The undue amount of accommodation given to the one is just so much taken from the wants of the others. If a speculator, for instance, can, by the aid of a bank, monopolise a single branch of trade, whom does he injure while he is enriching himself? He injures the consumer (and among consumers the laboring man feels it the hardest and the sconesty by increasing the price of the article. He injures also, and perhaps drives out of business, that other merchant of more limited capital, who, for the want of a portion of the very accommodation that has been granted to the large operator, has been wholly unable to enter the market as a purchaser. These facts, which we use as illustrations to our subject, cannot be gainsayed. That the practice is wrong cannot be denied, and that the evil must be remedied is not the sentiment of a few who are complaining from a sense of disappointment and injury, but the denand of the entire public. The very stock.

THE CLASSES THAT DEMAND PRO-If it were possible to separate the banks from those who hold their bills and who have deposited with them their means, candor constrains us to say there would not be in this community the slightest sympathy for these institutions. They would be suffered to go into liquidation by acclamation; and why is this sere in times of scarcity or pressure it was not forthcoming, but when money was required by the trading community—by the merchant, the mechanic, the manufacturer, and business men generally—in times of scarcity or pressure it was not forthcoming, but when money, or the representative of money, was plenty and cheap, these institutions were only too glad to obtain customers who would use it. These are facts which will enter largely into the consideration rem those who hold their bills and who have which will ontor largely into the consideration of the bank question within a short time, and when the new Legislature assembles. But because we have paid our debts in specie, thore we are heavily in debt! Let us review these questions the cause they are facts, let us not, in our just indignation at the rotrospect, forget the honest debter and creditors of these institutions.

These classes must be protected. For all practical purposes, as we stated yeaterday, the banks of Philadelphia and Pennsylvania have suspended, and their charters are forfeit. There is not a cilizon in this community who does not hold in his hand the charter of every one of the banks of this city, provided he chooses to take the steps necessary to enforce the law. These things show that the banks are in a great measure protected from the resontment of a disenchanted people by reason that hundreds and thousands of men are involved in their operations.

Our duty, however, at the present, is to abate the sufferings that affilict the whole community; It is for the banks and those whom he professes to lead and represent—to say whether their "relief" measures shall meet the satisfaction of our citizens or not. Let the legislators remember that outside of themselves and the banks, there is an immense body of men who will decide on their doings upon their sheet here pensoner and the remaining officer, Major species. We notice that the policemen of the Ninth and Tenth Wards, comprising the sixth district, are generally detailed for extra duties on special occasions, more so than the men of any other district. Probably this is on account of their acknowledged efficiency; and although their work is most onerous, it is gratifying to see that the Mayor appreciates the importance of their superior and frequent services

It has been suggested that a neat silver star, like these resently presented to the local telegraph operators, be worn by the policemen in the different wards. They are certainly far more tasteful than those now used.
