MORNING.

BY THE BIRD OF TOWER BALL

The morn with golden key locks up.
The entile of the Queen of Night,
And on its eastern terret plants.
A roog banner frieged with light.

The camb five of the starry host Are palling on the arare field, An stricken by the shafts of light The continues on duty yield.

Day's portals ope—a bridge of light
Rests on the mountain's hoary crown;
The first trees, with limbs outspread,
Are en'reld laiders reaching down,

Whereon the troop of sunbeams may Descend to wake the steeping earth, And mark upon the scale of time A unit, in the morning's birth.

These subbeams in the early dawn, The heart with rapture may attune; But all liq chords grow musicless Baneath their fervent rays at noon.

Yet while to its meridian
The sun is matchless glory goes,
The wise will seek at Tower Hall
The solace found in summer clothe

Then stern old flot, whose hot caress. Once called a tear from av'ry pore, May concentrate his force, nor move The crystal currents as before

With Bonnett's fabrice, thin and light. In which they'll be with tasts arrayed. They'll feel a sense of awest relief, Refrashing as the forest's shade.

For sophyrs, with their familing wings, Will through the many listene bear The anothing inflicates they peakers! As allusting of the pinness this.

Then may by readers, one and all, Ere balies the subril hild-day pky, Go hepingly to Tower Hall, And Bennett's summer clothing buy.

In it attired, seems and cool,
Their hearts will tremble with delight;
and more poetic thoughts have birth
Than Bamett's Bard can ever write,

The action of such a figure as we have her faintly presented would boldly, strikingly, and most unmistakeably show itself at almost any reasonable distance, and from every point of view. Its necessarily vast dimensions, and the height on which it would be placed, would not destrey the effect of the details. We ought to have the noblest, grandest, most expressive than the fading feudality of Europe as brought before us ?

inal result of this sad case of fraud, practised under the garb of religion, we herewith publish an extract from the letter of a correspondent is this city, which places this sinsick perpetrator of wrong in even a darker position before the public than has heretofore been allotted to him. We must, however, heartily dissent from this correspondent's mode of disposing of his subject, towards the close of his article—"and the worm that dies not hestening to his repast!" Too much malignity in this, and not enough charity.
