RICHARDSON'S IRISH LINENS,

CONSUMERS of RICHARDSON'S LINENS, and those desirous of obtaining the GENUINE GOODS, should see that the articles they purchase are sealed with the full name of the firm, viz:

RICHARDSON, SONS, & OWDEN,

As a guarantee of the soundness and durability of the Goods.

This caution is rendered essentially necessary, as large quantities of inferior and defective Linens are prepared, season after season, and sealed with the name of RICHARDSON by Irish houses, who, regardless of the injury thus inflicted alike on the American consumer and the manufacturers of the genuine Goods, will not readily abandon a business so profitable, while purchasers can be imposed on; with Goods of a worthless character.

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 1, 1858.

Private Life of Napoleon III*.

"No man," says the proverb, "is a hero to his own valet." After perusing The Public and Private Life of Napoleon the Third, by SAMUEL M. SMUCKER, we are inclined to extend the application, and declare that if lives be taken on his plan, no man could be a hero to his own biographer. Hitherto, the practice almost invariably has been for a biographer to feel some kindly interest in, some genial sympathy with, the person whose life he presents to the public. There have been exceptions—rare and discreditable. One notorious one is the venomous and slanderous Memoir of EDGAR A. POE, prefaced to his collected works, and written by that amiable being RUFUS W. GRISWOLD. Mr. SMUCKER, we regret to notice, has followed the Griswoldian example. His private Life of NAPOLEON III collects, concentrates, accumulates, points, and adopts all the scandalous rumors, the coarse inventions, the prurient accusations which Rumor and Hate, both very fruitful in such things, had ever uttered or even whispered against the personal character and conduct of LOUIS NAPOLEON. Beyond doubt, Mr. SMUCKER deserves consideration as the most credulous of men, for he accepts accusation as proof.

His Biography treats of the public as well as the private life of the Emperor. In the relation of events which now are historical, he is frequently, but not always correct. He is wrong when he speaks of JEROME BONAPARTE, half-educated and rough, as "romantic." In relating the trial for the Boulogne expedition, he does not give, even allude scarcely to, the speech which LOUIS NAPOLEON himself delivered, in which he emphatically spoke of Waterloo as an injury to be avenged by France. In relating the movements in 1852, preliminary to the restoration of the Empire, he omits LOUIS NAPOLEON'S remarkable speech at the Bridge of Austerlitz, on October 15, in reply to the Prefect of the Seine, who offered him the purple. On the following day, (October 16th, 1852,) LOUIS NAPOLEON liberated ABDEL-KADER from prison (we saw him at liberty, in Paris, three weeks later,) but on page 203 Mr. SMUCKER states that liberation to have occurred in March 1855, after the birth of the Prince Imperial. On page 221, he reports Marshal CANROBERT as having gone, "after his return from the Crimea," on a diplomatic mission to obtain the hand of a Swedish Princess for LOUIS NAPOLEON, that is, in the summer of 1856, whereas, in page 182, he details the circumstances of LOUIS NAPOLEON'S marriage with Mademoiselle de MONTIJO (not MONTIGO,) in January 1853, nearly three years earlier. He gives an incorrect version (page 60) of Col. VAUDREY'S address to the soldiers at Strasburg in 1836. He states (page 184) that the standing army of France was only 80,000 men under LOUIS PHILIPPE, but that LOUIS NAPOLEON reduced it, in 1852, to 30,000, and was engaged, in 1853, in diminishing it to 20,000. Now, every body who knows any thing about the military power of France must see how incorrect this is. Under LOUIS PHILIPPE it was rarely under 300,000; it is about 400,000 now, and has been considerably more. Mr. SMUCKER reflects upon LOUIS NAPOLEON as having "enlisted" among the special constables who aggregated on April 10, 1848, to defend London from threatened attacks by the Chartists. There was no enlistment. The movement, at once simultaneous and voluntary, was by able-bodied men of all ranks and classes, to take the defensive, if occasion required it. NAPOLEON III was a special constable, and so were the leading nobility and gentry then in London, as well as the mass of the working classes. This great moral force made the Chartists powerless. 'Tis said (page 235) that the Duke of DEVONSHIRE would not have wedded his daughter to LOUIS NAPOLEON:—he was a bachelor, and had no daughter. We could multiply instances, but these will show how carelessly Mr. SMUCKER has compiled.

There is one personal circumstance which deserves notice. In page 102, Mr. SMUCKER says, "The excuse urged by the Prince to his confidants for attempting his escape [from Ham] was that he might attend the sick-bed of his father. But we [Mr. SMUCKER] believe this to have been merely a pretended reason; LOUIS NAPOLEON well knew that the ex-King of Holland was probably not his father; and the fact that he really did not pay the slightest regard to his alleged parent after his escape from the fortress had been effected—the fact that he immediately directed his steps, not toward Florence but toward London, clearly proves that he had no sincere desire to visit the former husband of HORTENSE, with whom, during her life-time, he had been constantly and bitterly at variance." This is a fair specimen of Mr. SMUCKER'S fact and argument. How a man can well know a probability is curious. LOUIS NAPOLEON, on his escape, went to London, it being the only safe asylum open to him. But, page 107, Mr. SMUCKER states that "On the Prince's arrival in London, he applied for passports from the representative of the Grand Duke of Tuscany, permitting him to visit his father in Florence. They were denied him, and the Grand Duke afterward informed the ex-King of Holland that 'French influence' would not permit him to tolerate the presence of LOUIS NAPOLEON in Florence even for twenty-four hours. The ex-King expired soon afterward, without again seeing LOUIS NAPOLEON, whom in his latter years he pretended to regard as his son!" This last sentence is a gratuitous innendo, for the ex-King of Holland never denied, never doubted the paternity. But it is evident, from Mr. SMUCKER'S own admission, that the first use LOUIS NAPOLEON made of his newly-recovered liberty, once that he reached London, was to use every effort to visit his father. How he could do so in May 1846, if (as we find in page 206) that father had previously died, in January 1846, we leave others to determine. Mr. SMUCKER ought to have been, at least, correct in dates—the ex-King of Holland did not die in January, but in July, 1846.

The innendo in the previous quotation shows that Mr. SMUCKER fully endorses the slanders about HORTENSE, the mother of LOUIS NAPOLEON. He seems to have an especial feeling against that lady. From "authorities of no mean importance" (whom he does not name) he accepts the slanderous assertion that not a drop of Bonaparte blood flows in LOUIS NAPOLEON'S veins, and that he is son of HORTENSE "by her favorite lover, Admiral VERHUEL." Over and over again this suspected illegitimacy is pressed upon the reader, as a fact of which the biographer has no doubt. We have "his supposed father" on page 87; again, on page 102, King LOUIS is mentioned "as probably not his father;" and on page 24 "the very considerable similarity" of his features to VERHUEL'S is strongly urged. At the same time, it is repeated, on the authority of FOUCHE (!) that when HORTENSE married LOUIS, she "was then already pregnant by the Emperor," her own step-father, and (Mr. SMUCKER adds) that "subsequent events seemed indeed to give the color of truth to these assertions." Finally, Mr. SMUCKER speaks of "the unscrupulous violence of her passions," and declares that she "is said to have spent her whole life in a series of liaisons." With Mr. SMUCKER it seems enough for a scandal to be "said"—he adopts it at once. Yet, though HORTENSE is thus depicted as a modern MESSALINA, even Mr. SMUCKER admits her to have been an admirable mother.

LOUIS NAPOLEON himself, however, is the direct object of Mr. SMUCKER'S moral antipathy. Every well-informed person now believes that there was no truth in the declarations that LOUIS NAPOLEON was riotous and sensual while residing in New York, an exile, in 1837. Mr. SMUCKER repeats the accusations, kindly suggesting that it was probable they were exaggerated, but adding, ex suo motu, as an ascertained fact, that LOUIS NAPOLEON was fond of luxurious living, and indulged to some degree in dissipation during his residence in New York; that among his favorite places of resort was an infamous saloon kept by an abandoned French woman, and frequented by the most dissipated adventurers of New York of both sexes; that here he became familiar with a Spanish Jewess, named BALLARO, described by Mr. SMUCKER as "the impassioned and ardent JOSEPHINE." Now, the fact is that LOUIS NAPOLEON'S life in New York, whence he was called by the death-illness of his mother, was that of a retired man of letters. He went very little into society, and was noticed for the gravity of his demeanor and conduct.

After his mother's death, LOUIS NAPOLEON resided in England, until the Boulogne fiasco of 1840. His biographer says that he devoted these two years to "the gratification of his passions," and that "even his personal character and self-respect were absorbed or lost in his devotion or abandonment to pleasure"—that he was tolerated by the British aristocracy as any "intelligent debauchee" would be "who mingled intimately with all the more dissipated classes of society"—and that, at Lady BLESSINGTON'S, he "was thrown into the society of the most distinguished personages of the time in England." Mr. SMUCKER, we regret to observe, writes this without knowledge of the facts. About a dozen distinguished persons—such as MOORE, BULWER, DISRAELI, Lord DURHAM, FONBLANQUE, and so on—used to frequent Lady BLESSINGTON'S, but her personal character was such that scrupulous persons avoided her, while the female members of her visitors' families never set foot within her house. Even very few gentlemen visited her.

In this time, 1837-9, says Mr. SMUCKER, certainly LOUIS NAPOLEON, "now led the life of a dissipated adventurer" in London, visiting gambling-houses, betting on horse-races, frequenting "the most fashionable
