The Press.

MONDAY, MAY 2, 1859.

New Publications.

Commencing, as in duty bound, with publications emanating from our own city, we have to notice a magnificent Map of the World, on Mercator's Projection, executed by S. Augustus Mitchell, and published by Charles DeSilver, 714 Chestnut street. It is large but not cumbersome, neatly mounted upon a roller, each country (and with us every State) distinguishingly colored, and the whole neatly varnished. Indeed, it is a handsome and very complete Library map. All the leading routes are marked down; a large list of distances is given; Oceanica and Australia are represented in an enlarged manner. The discoveries of the most recent travellers have been used to secure accuracy. In a word, it is an excellent map.

Mr. Desilver has published a new volume of his Intellectual Classics, edited by Mr. Thomas Clark. It contains the whole of the Anabasis of Xenophon, with an interlinear translation, on the Hamiltonian system, improved by Mr. Clark. Like the preceding volumes, it is intended for the use of schools and private learners, and confident we are that, by the aid of such books, the principal difficulties of translation are readily removable.

From Grissey and Markley, of Goldsmith's Hall, we have received an American Pronouncing Dictionary of the English Language, by Alexander H. Laidlaw, A. M., who, for some years, has been successfully employed in teaching. We have long felt that such a book should be prepared, but did not expect to find it so well done, and in such a comparatively small space. Mr. Laidlaw's definitions are plain and sensible. We have tested his pronunciation of words, and have detected only a single error. He does not countenance the current barbarisms of mispronunciation, which make the Americans sometimes laughed at in England. For example, the words inquiry, European, tribune, Italian, are frequently miscalled inquir-ry, Europey-an, iry-bune, and I-talian. Mr. Laidlaw properly puts them inqui-ry, Euro-pe-an, trib-une, and It-alian. When he pronounces mercantile as if it were mercantill, we believe that he is wrong. This is an American mode. In England, it is pronounced as mercan-tile. There are about 40,000 words defined in this dictionary, with pronunciations. The appendix, containing many other useful matters, hints to spellers, which must facilitate the attainment of correct orthography. This Dictionary, we suppose, will become a much-used school-book, but every one who reads and writes may advantageously consult it. It is well-printed and firmly as well as neatly bound.

E. H. Butler & Co. have published Elements of Rhetoric, designed as a manual of instruction, by Professor Coppée, of the University of Pennsylvania. The author seems to have ransacked every book treating of Rhetoric, and putting the cream of their contents into the alembic of his own cultivated mind, to have distilled, as it were, from such materials, a work clear, concise, scholarly, and very complete. His references from American and English writers, show an enlarged acquaintance with polite literature.

To William S. and Alfred Martien we are indebted for a delightful book for youth. This is the seventh edition, with a map and illustrations of "Robert and Harold, or the Young Marooners of the Florida Coast," written by P. R. Goulding, of Georgia. It is something in the manner of Robinson Crusoe, with more adventure, and without his utter solitude and the overwhelming melancholy of his situation.

Moss & Brother have issued the second edition, revised and improved, of the Cottage Garden of America, by Walter Elder, a practical gardener, who resides in this city. It contains a good deal of information, very plainly put, and every one who has a garden may advantageously consult it. A dozen pages at the close of this little book advantageously show the animals and vermin characteristic of Shall we have Water in the Squares?

[For The Press.]

MR. EDITOR:—Your correspondent "H" exhibits a very commendable case for the city finances, in rebuking the Ledger for giving publicity to a communication recommending a means of securing a drink of cool water to such of our citizens as visit the public squares during the hot months.

Certainly it would be a piece of extra vagance in the city of Philadelphia, to make the water which it permits the public to imbibe in the squares palatable and refreshing, by expending about 20 cents per day for ice in each of those squares, or so many of them as it might see proper to accommodate with an ice box for the purpose of cooling the water. Such a wasteful expenditure should not be thought of, particularly when we are about to cut off the supplies for the squirrels, because the city cannot afford to provide them with nuts. We propose introducing birds instead of these destructive gormandising squirrels, and our economical friend "H" should protest in time against the introduction of any varieties that cannot provide for themselves, without taxing the city for their support.

The herd of deer in Logan Square should be sent to the almshouse, or consigned to the tender mercies of the caterers for corporation dinners and festive entertainments of visiting committees; for the brutes have cost the city much money, not only for their support, but for the mischief which they have done. The peacocks and hens have also to be fed, I fear. Should they not be sold to save expense?

The economical views of "H" had prevailed in Councils at an earlier day, what a saving might have been effected—or, rather, how much useless expenditure might have been avoided! Sedgely would not have been purchased, nor any appropriation have been made for beautifying Fair Mount; that is, for the next these expenditures for unnecessary objects?

But "H" is furthermore apprehensive that a drink of cool water, taken by the children who overheat themselves with skipping the rope or trundling the hoop in the squares, might prejudice their health. Poor things! Cannot the superintendent be induced to play the part of Sancho Panza's medical adviser, and deny them the indulgence of a refreshing draft, lest their health should be endangered? provided their friends should be so reckless or negligent as to suffer them to visit scenes of such danger without attending and guarding them against the lurking, insidious danger of "a cup of cold water."

A much better book, also published by Scribner, is the "Science and Art of Chess," by J. Monroe, B. C. L. It is eminently practical, as it is calculated greatly to assist young chess-pyers.

Delisser & Procter, of New York, have judiciously republished the Poems and Ballads of Goethe, translated by Professor Aytoun, of Blackwood's Magazine, and Theodore Martin, the author of the jeux d'esprit known to the world as "Bon Gaultier's Ballads." The minor pims of Goethe are unequal in merit, but the 1st of them are here, and the translators, so commenced their labors in this field may years ago, have earned the gratitude of Engli and American readers by their tasteful election and their spirited versions. Germanscholars may object, perhaps, to the manner in which some of these poems are rendered to English; but this volume is not for the Geran scholar, but for the masses who are unle to read Goethe in the original, yet desire know what manner of lyrics he wrote. To thi ss class of readers, the book will be very septable and profitable.

A lis of James Watt—he of the steam-engine—with selections from his correspondence, is lately been well written by J. A. Muirhead, who has already written much on the mechanical inventions of the great engineer, his kinsman. It has been republished by Appleton & Co., of New York. Hitherto, there has been no good biography of Watt. The notice by Arago was more scientific than personal, and was but a sketch. Mr. Muirhead, who is connected with Watt by blood, and had fullest access to his papers, has produced a biography which must be accepted as highly satisfactory—worthy of being placed by the side of Smiles' Life of George Stephenson, founder of Railwayism. A good index adds value to the book.

Ticknor & Fields, of Boston, have added another volume of De Quincy's writings to their collection. It contains a narrative called "The Avenger," sundry additions to the celebrated Confessions of an Opium-eater, some curious Traditions of the Rabbins, and a singularly well-argued paper upon the recent China war. In a prefatory letter to the American editor of his works, (J. T. Fields?) De Quincy gratefully states his obligation for the collecting of his works, from various publications, and his acknowledgment for the pecuniary advantages which he has derived from the liberality of Ticknor & Fields.

These publishers have issued another "blue and gold," containing the poems of William Motherwell, one of the best of the modern minor poets of Scotland. We shall soon notice this book at some length, so shall only here add that it contains many very noble lyrics.

Gould & Lincoln, of Boston, who had previously re published the works of Hugh Miller, have just issued a volume, containing his Lectures in Popular Geology, with descriptive sketches from a Geologist's Portfolio. This is prefaced by a résumé of the progress of Geological Science, within the last two years, by Mrs. Miller. The Lectures, delivered in Edinburgh, strike us as being fully equal, at least, to the best of Miller's most successful writings. They contain the matured knowledge of a life-time. The Descriptive Sketches, which conclude the volume, are exceedingly graphic.

The Rev. Dr. F. W. Faber, who quitted the Anglican for the Romish Church, some years ago, and is now a Catholic clergyman, in London, lately published a volume of practical religious essays or exercises, called "Spiritual Conferences," which has just been reissued by John Murphy & Co., of Baltimore. It is written with eloquence as well as power. Mr. Faber gives many hard hits. For example, when he says of Cowper, "a pious man who makes piety attractive, there are nine who make it repulsive. Or, in other words, only one out of ten among reputed spiritual persons is really spiritual."

From W. B. Zieber we have No. 4 of "The Pulpit and the Rostrum," a New York semi-occasional periodical, containing a sermon on the Progress and Demands of Christianity, by the Rev. W. H. Milburn, the blind preacher. Also the April number of the Art Journal, with engravings after Mulready and Stansfield, and a sketch of "The Prodigal Son," a sculptured group executed, at Rome, by Mr. J. Mozier, an American self-taught amateur artist. A very fine number, this, of a popular work. From Mr. Zieber, also, we have the last number of Blackwood's Magazine. There is a continuation of a story here, the time that of Richard Cœur de Lion, which is the best historical novel of that remote era since "Ivanhoe." It is called "The Luck of Lady Ismere."

From Petersons' we have the May number of The Great Republic Monthly—not very well printed and coarsely illustrated.

From P. E. Abel, theatrical publisher, (306 Chestnut street,) we have several numbers of French's American Drama, Minor Drama, and Standard Drama. They are neatly printed, and sold at a low price. The constitute the acting drama, as what is called the whole stage "business" is marked on, with costumes, &c. Several of these plays are American—such as A Glance at New York; G. L. Aiken's adaptation of Uncle Tom's Cabin; John Brougham's Miller of New Jersey, and The Dark Hour before Dawn, written for the Dramatic Fund performances, at New York, by John Brougham and Frank B. Goodrich. This last takes rank merely from the motive which created it. There is only one good situation in the whole play—namely, at the close of Act II. [illegible] This is worth making a note of.

Jules Tardieu, of Paris, has recently published four little works, by J. T. de Saint-Germain. These are "L'Art d'être Malheureux," and three legends, respectively called "Pour une Epingle," "Mignon," and "Lady Clare." These four little books are wonders in their way, and in their day. French literature, especially French fiction, has been lately at such fever heat, that it is refreshing to come across such gems of freshness and simplicity. M. Tardieu (the real name of the author) appears to be perfectly conversant with the English language and with English tastes. "Lady Clare," the last publication, is the amplification in prose of Tennyson's ballad of Lady Clare, and is worthy of the model. Mignon is a charming episode of every day life, addressed to all the better feelings of our nature. All these works are written with great elegance and purity of style, reminding one of Paul et Virginie and Bernardin de St. Pierre. They are works that may, with great benefit, safely be put into the hands of our young ladies, which is more than can be said for modern French novels in general. Mr. Pennington has shown great judgment and taste in selecting and importing them.

Another of Petersons' new books is a novel called "The Jealous Husband," by Mrs. Maillard, an English writer. It is a very interesting story, well worth republication. It strikes us, however, as not being entirely new to us.

W. A. Townsend & Co., of New York, have published another volume (the fourth) of their magnificent edition of the novels and romances of Fenimore Cooper, with first-class engravings, on steel and wood, from original drawings by Darley, whom we are proud to claim as a Philadelphian. Even the London Athenæum, always so difficult with American books, smiles grimly upon this superb edition of Cooper, and admits that in paper, binding, printing, and illustration, every thing has been done to make it worthy of the most liberal patronage. The new volume contains "The Spy," which was the first of Cooper's American novels. The illustrations are beautiful. The vignette (on steel) representing the escape of Harvey Birch, is a perfect gem. "The Spy" contains two of the best characters ever drawn by Cooper—Harvey Birch, the Spy, and the grave but gallant gentleman, Mr. Harper, who eventually appears as Washington himself. Prefixed to this edition is the author's introduction, giving a history of the writing of the book, and the real incident which suggested it.

From Harper & Brothers, of New York, we have received Charles Reade's new domestic story, (called "Love me little, Love me long,") which we have already heartily commended to our readers. There is a reality, freshness, and truth about it, very pleasant to novel-readers. From the same publishers we have a remarkable volume, which, albeit of a scientific nature, we know that the general reader will appreciate and enjoy. It is "The Life of North American Insects," written by P. R. Jaegor, late Professor of Zoology and Botany in the College of New Jersey. He has been assisted by Dr. H. C. Preston. The volume contains sixty-nine engravings of insects, from specimens in the cabinet of the author. We believe that all the book's most valuable insects are here described. But never has Entomology been made one-half so interesting nor entertaining, and herein lies the value of the book. Mr. Jaeger is an enthusiast, earnest and eloquent, and in his hands even "the por beetle that we tread upon" becomes an object of importance. The chapter upon Bees is admirable. What adds to the value of the bok is the extreme fidelity and delicacy of the wood engravings.

From Messrs Harper we have also received "The American Home Garden," profusely illustrated, by Alexander Watson. Whoever the wrer may be he fully knows his pleasant subject. We are happy in the belief that, year afar year, a taste for gardening is extending among all classes, in this vast community. With Mr. Watson's aid,—that is, the aid of his book,—every person may teach himself how to raise vegetables, fruits, flowers, young trees, ad farm-crops.

From Charles Scribner, New York, we have another volume of N. P. Willis's newspaper articles. It is called "The Convalescent." It contins a good deal of ambitious writing, variouseffets attempts at wit and sentiment, severalnewly-coined words, and little that the reser would care to recollect. The best part of te volume is the conclusion, in which a trip t Virginia is described. Mr. Willis, we suspct, has nearly written himself out.

A mch better book, also published by Scribner, is the "Science and Art of Chess," by J. Monroe, B. C. L. It is eminently practical, as it is calculated greatly to assist young chess-pyers.

Delisser & Procter, of New York, have judiciouslyrepublished the Poems and Ballads of Goethe, translated by Professor Aytoun, of Blackwood's Magazine, and Theodore Martin, the authrs of the jeux d'esprit known to the world as "Bon Gaultier's Ballads." The minor pims of Goethe are unequal in merit, but the 1st of them are here, and the translators, so commenced their labors in this field may years ago, have earned the gratitude of Engli and American readers by their tasteful election and their spirited versions. Germanscholars may object, perhaps, to the manner in which some of these poems are rendered to English; but this volume is not for the Geran scholar, but for the masses who are unle to read Goethe in the original, yet desire know what manner of lyrics he wrote. To thi ss class of readers, the book will be very septable and profitable.

A lis of James Watt—he of the steam-engine—with selections from his correspondence, is lately been well written by J. A. Muirhead, who has already written much on the mechanical inventions of the great engineer, his kinsman. It has been republished by Appleton & Co., of New York. Hitherto, there has been no good biography of Watt. The notice by Arago was more scientific than personal, and was but a sketch. Mr. Muirhead, who is connected with Watt by blood, and had fullest access to his papers, has produced a biography which must be accepted as highly satisfactory—worthy of being placed by the side of Smiles' Life of George Stephenson, founder of Railwayism. A good index adds value to the book.

Ticknor & Fields, of Boston, have added another volume of De Qu
