The letter of Postmaster General Holt, in justification of the removal of Postmaster Westcott of your city, as attravagantly praised by the Administration papers, is chiefly remarkable for its anger and undignified malignity. One would suppose, from reading it, that Mr. Holt had been desired to write a bitter personal attack upon our officer's character, instead of a salm, dispassionate official paper. I am not an apologist for Mr. Westcott. Like yourself, I have not seen to speak to him for nearly two years, but I have to meet the first unprejudiced person who believes that he was oriminal in the matter charged against him. If the theory of Mr. Holt is right (and it is not my purpose to dispute it,) hereafter no responsible gentleman will be found willing to accept such a position as postmaster in a great city. If a limited subordinates in one of these offices are permitted to manipulate the money as thomas in, under the assurances contained in Mr. Holt's tetter, that the postmaster is to make up all that is lost or stolon, it may be a much more profitable position to hold a place inner the whole of a city post office, than to be at the legis of such an establishment. As I understand the case, Mr. Westcott did no more than his predecessors had done when he found a deseit at the end of a quarter, he compelled those who had the handling of the money to make it up, get, indeed out of their own salaries, but out of a writted among them? It is frue, in this respect, the in-among these. It is true, in this respect, the innocent suffered with the guilty; but it is also true, that these who were salled upon to make up the daddit were the very persons who had had the handling of the money. For this, and this only, Mr. Westbott, was removed. Mr. Holt makes the best of his cases, and no doubt has satisfed the Presidant, particularly in the malevolence which marks every line of his latter. But pray, dear Mr. Hashanan—now that you are determined to

It is now clear, from this desperate struggle that the Italian campaign will be one of the deadlisst in history. We see it stated that the Austriass have 240,000, man at present in that country, and by the midle of maxt more hit to number will be increased; to 225,000; with 75,000 horses and 900 guos. The German Quarterly Review, gooded by the same authority, gives brance or call for 600 000 men and 1,200 pieces of field artillery. Austria, on the other hand, it is asserted, can raise, between 730,000 to 800,000 men and 184 guns. Its not probable that the absence of that great sinew of war—hard cash—may bring this starrible contest to a speciar close that the beligacents at present negine?
