Letter from "Occasional." [Correspondence of The Press.]

Washington, Sept. 15, 1659.
One of the most interesting problems of the day to Democratic politicians, is the course of the Administration in regard to the succession. The so extremely gloomy that he feels himself obliged to declare, in the most emphatic terms, that he has no aspirations for the re-election which he sees no prospect of securing; and yet "hope springs eternal in the human breast," and he consoles himself with the idea that something may possibly yet turn up before the Charleston Convention assembles to In the meantime, the adherents of the Adminis tration must have somebody to parade before the public as their nominal candidate, upon whom they can rally their forces, after they become fully satisfied that an ungrateful and unfortu-nate country must inevitably be deprived of Mr. Buchanan's valuable services as President. Now, who shall this successor be? What name and something more, daily to connive at and | shall be inscribed in the will of our great chief as the fortunate inheritor of his prestige, and the future possessor of his political influence? As matters now stand, neither Douglas, Wise, Hunter, non Breckinridge, can expect the present Presidentia mantle to fall upon their shoulders. For a time the redoubtable Gen. Jo. Lane of Oregon appeared election in Oregon has pretty effectually disposed of his pretensions. The triumph of Gen. Sam

Walker's name has also been suggested; for since his reconciliation he has become a great favorite with the Administration, but somehow or other this idea does not meet with such favor. permit their plans to mature before interforing.
