All went on for a couple of seasons, and then Madame Gazzaniga he gan to exervise these caprices which petted vocalists glory in exhibiting in foreign lands, and which they dare not attempt to display in their own native places, where paid singers are not allowed by the Government to disappoint the public. Here, however, we saw Madamo Gazzaniga so puffed up with praise (and unaccustomed dollars) that she positively declined to appear in the same opera with Madame do la Grange, certainly one of the best vocalists who have ever sang in this counhuman sympathy, than the application of the try. Next came Pauline Colson-young, talented, and a more attractive singer than even La Grange. Whether Gazzaniga, as is most likely, dreaded the results of immediate contrast with Colson, we know not, but she declined singing with her also

Gazzaniga did not extend. As an artist, every judge of singing must admit that Colson was every way more effective than Gazzaniga-both which in miny bid many a hone-itead, far and near, cratic spirit of the nation is rapidly and cer-tainly asserting its dignity and power, through the aid and influence of thousands who are sickened by the despotism of which new evisickened by the despotism of which new evi-dences are daily presented to their minds, and by the weakened and distracted condition into
