OUR PORT-FOLIO THE DEATH WARRING .- It grieves us exceedingly to have any thing to relate deroga-tory to the character of one of the medical profession; and yet our duty as a faithful chronicler of the times, both by gone and present, will not allow us in all cases to consult our own individual or professional feelings. We quickly, Justus." are bound to cast saide the mantle of prejudice and partiality, and stand encased only in the Doctor Phlebotemy dwelt in a wealthy and populous village on the banks of the ----, where he had an extensive and lucrative prac tice; not only embracing the village itself, but which is every thing in the practice of medicine; for a physician, having the good opinion of the female portion of the community, may calculate on the support of the male as a matter of course. Such was the good fortune of Doctor Phiebotomy. He was believed, about

Yet, with all these advantages, he could not In the mean time, the appalling noise had be satisfied with his proper and lawful gains, become fainter and fainter, and at the last to-but fell into the bad habit of charging two visits tally diod away. But the warning had been his accounts had swelled to an amount little and the Doctor endeavored to make such preto be expected in a country practice.

Doctor Phlebotomy was not altogether believer in supernatural warnings, and ghostly premonitions—but the state of his health that evening, the partial effect of the paregoric, the ominess of the weather, and the conscious ness of fraud in his dealings towards his patients, united, along with the dismal noise, to nearly closed. His imagination became painonly like that of a drowning mortal, but as if a body were rudely let down into a grave, and alarm, the drowned old sow. the clods were carelessly thrown upon the coffin and then, there were the groans of an unquiet and troubled spirit, as if reluctantly parting with its tenement of clay. Mrs. Phlebotomy was just getting into bed, when the Doctor, aroused from his incipient slumbers, and giving wings to his morbid fancy. started up and exclaimed: "Wh-wh-what's that, my dear?"

"Nothing, I presume," said the good lady-"it's merely your imagination."
"My imagination! Mrs. Phlebotomy? Why, do you think my imagination can make such a noise as that? It sounds ominous." Do lie down, Doctor," said the affection ate wife, gently laying her hand on his shoulder do lie down and cover yourself up; you'll take fresh cold."

She succeeded in making him lie down-"Why-why-to be sure-I can't say-and yet—I dare say—I presume, my dear, it's nothing but the wind. You know the wind is uncommonly high to-night." Thus, Mrs. Phlebotomy endeavered, like loving wife, to calm the apprehensions of her husband. But she was not without fear herself. She had heard the noise, and was a firm believer in signs and forewarnings of approaching mortality. But she wished to allay the fears of her husband, lest they might have an injurious effect on his health, and perhaps carry him to the grave before his appointed time. It was therefore both natural and prudent to endeavor, as well as she could, to soothe his apprehensions, and to persuade him that he was deceived by his imagination. The dismal sound continued, and seemed every moment to wax more and more fearful. But whatever of the supernatural and marvel-lous the imagination of the Doctor might have conjured up, there was something in the sounds particularly vulgar and brutish. It was as if a swine were indignantly grunting forth a male-diction upon its untimely and cruel fate; as if it were breathing its last, and sighing out a

But Doctor Phlebotomy had other thoughts than those relating to swine. He verily imastant those relating to swine. He verily imagined he was summoned away. He had witnessed the call to many a mortal, but never, until this hour, had he been seriously affected. There was a wide difference between his own case and that of his patients—he could look upon the approach of death to others unshrinking and unappalled. But now the case was brought home to his own door. He was not exactly fit to die, nor willing to go even had he been fit. He wanted to make more double charges, and he wanted leisure to repent afterwards. With avarice unsatisfied, a sore throat, excited nerves, and conscience of the Philadelphia Exchange.)
