RECOLLECTIONS OF A PORTRAIT PAINTER.

To portray upon Ivery the features which will probably grow black in the dust 'long before even his fragile tints have faded—to give to dearest to their hearts, some khadow of their visible presence—this is the task of this Paint ter.

Many have been the giad, and many the sorrowful occasions upon which my pencil has been summoned; one ar two of the scenes it is my purpose to lay before the reader, in colors not bright, perhaps, but true.

Years have passed since, one morning in the carly season, I was stoused from my labors in my studio by the arrival of a visitor. He was young, and there was in his air that which indicated the union of high birth and mental superiority. His manner was elegant, and yet it the carls was an elegant, and yet it the carls was a policy of the State Bank, in the Charleston Mercury that, on Thursday last, two $50 bills of the State Bank, in the Charleston Mercury that, or the read was not belong to our arms, although the bark, on Thursday last, two $50 bills of the State Bank, in the Charleston Mercury that, or the reader was not belong to our arms, although the former find on a propriate place of the presente in the reading shield, or a chief, as the file of the state Bank, in the carls are the read in the chief; but these do not belong to our arms, although the former find on an appropriate place on the flag of our country.'

We learn from the Charleston Mercury that, on Thursday last, two $50 bills of the State Bank, in the carls are the read in the chief; but these do not belong to our arms, although the former find on the chief; but these do not belong to our arms, although the former find on the chief; but these do not belong to our arms, although the former find on the chief; but these do not belong to our arms, although the former find on the chief. dicated the union of high birth and mental surperiority. His manner was elegant, and yet it was not without a touch of embarrassment.

We learn from the Charleston Mercury that, on Hollday Girras—The Storeoscope and Pictures, truly a New Year's present. It will afford pleasure for the was not without a touch of embarrassment. was not without a touch of embarrassment.

"I have called?" said he, "in the hope—in the belief that it is possible for an artist to take a likeness from—from memory—should there be a dislike to sitting."

"I have been able to do so," replied I, a little surprised at his marked confusion.

"I have been able to for me, I should be might have been fraudulently before the public, when it was discovered that from a package of two ARRIVALS AT THE reconstruction of the state ene in whom my very existence is bound up we have been brought up together, but we must be separated. You shall see her, and if you will give me a sketch, however slight?—

For a moment he covered his face with his hands. I promised a ready compliance with his wishes, if he would instruct me how to proceed. It was arranged that I was to go with him that night to the opera—that I should see the arbitress of his fate—the keeper of his heart's treasure. "One glance at her foatures," he said, "will be my best excuse." It would have been impossible for me to hesitate long, for his passionate entreaties would have prevailed upon a far less sensitive nature than mine.

To the opera I went with him that night; and in all the desizing circle around, there and in all the dazzling circle around, there was not one whose beauty could for a moment compare with that of the young and exquisite face that I was to remember! Who that had ever seen it could forget it? My companion entered her box, and the change that came over her bright cheek told its own tale, whilst the aid of cold politenes Increase 45,257 14 with which the lady of stately and matronly PHILADELPHIA, STOCK EXCHANGE SALES December 23, 1889. appearance who was by her side, greeted his Exported by S. Once more I went to gaze upon it; and with a throbbing heart I sketched her matchless features. I had caught the smile with which she welcomed him, and when I placed it before my stranger guest, I thought that, in the folly of his young love, he would have worshipped the hand that gave consolation to his exile.

Months passed by, when I received a request from Lord R.—that I would paint a miniature of his young "fiancée." I of course compiled, and at the hour appointed for the sitting, his lordship entered the rosm, a lady leaning on his arm; the same, aye, the same fair creature whom I had already sketched for asother!

I sat down to my sad task, and had scarcely commenced when a domestic brought in a card. The pale check of Lady R—flushed deeply, as she tremblingly exclaimed, "Let him come in." deeply, as she tremblingly exclaimed, "Let him come in."

"My love," interrupted Lord R—, "you are not well enough to see strangers."

"Strangers! We were brought up together," whispered the dying creature.

The door fiew open, and the visitor entered. I knew him at the first glance. He walked hurriedly to the sofa on which the lady sat, incapable of rising (though evidently anxious) to receive him. He appeared to see but one abject in the apartment—of Lord R——'s presence he seemed wholly unconscious. He wildly pressed a pale, thin, cold hand to his lips—hers murmured some one word that might be his name, but it was scarcely audible. The hand grew colder in his fevered pressure. Yes, even before Lord R—— could interpose, or profice assistance—she, with one long, intense look upon features familiar to her from childhood, and imaged probably in her marriage-dreams, had fallen back, the loveliest ruin ever eye beheld.
