The fourth and last great point in the Queen's speech (for the promise, for the twentieth time, of a Referm Bill, is almost matter of form), is contained in the following brief announcement: "I am in communica tion with the Emperor of the French with view to extend the commercial intercours between the two countries, and thus draw

This refers to a Treaty, between England and France, signed since the Speech was doivered, whereby, to a certain extent, the Emperor NAPOLEON, some eighteen months from this time (August 1861), will introduce Free Trade, to a limited extent, into his dominions. This Treaty, it has transpired, has been in course of negotiation since last August—during the angry period, indeed, when LEON was meditating by day and dreaming by night of nothing less than invading England taking London by storm, plundering the Bank of England, establishing a Provisional Government in Whitehall, converting Buckingham Palace into a barrack, turning the Lord Mayor out of Guildhall, and placing the Pre-Oprporation, and making a bondre of Wind sor Castle. On the contrary, Napoleon wa quietly engaged, with RICHARD CORDEN and MICHAEL CHEVALIER, in perfecting a plan England closer, in the relations of mutual interest; than they over yet have been. Well might the poet say: Peace hath her vioteries no less than War," Protection, abolished in England by Si Robert Pers in 1846, has long been a drawback upon the productive industry of France. In a new country, Protection may be an ad vantage, if not a necessity-but there was no need of it in France. NaroLeon's plan embraces the following points: Raw materials such as cotton and wool, are to be relieved from all duty, a step which will inevitably lead to the abolition or material reduction of the eduty on iron and coal. The tax on sugar and coffee is to be gradually reduced; the means of conveyance and transit are to be improved "and cheapened; agriculture and industry will of public utility are to be premoted, and prohibitive duties suppressed. In short, it is the design of the Emperor to stimulate to the utmost the productive power of France, and to as will open their markets on terms of mutual advantage to the products of French industry. There will be an increased demand for raw Colonel Forney, in responding, took occasion to thank, from the lottom of his heart, those kind friends who had surrounded him with this welcome and unexpected greeting to Philadelphia. They had come to celebrate an event in which he had lately held the most prominent part—his eldwaid in a position of honor and dimitive the surredge of no principles, and, secondly, the telling of no lies. He was chosen to that resition by the aid of an imment his oftry of gentlement to whom he had been to politically opposed, and what he would be in the future. stronghold of whatever was left of political ffeedem in this country. It was the irresultable element at work revolutionizing the whole American nation.

All the men who asserted this principle and defended this right had been personted, in a manner heratofore unprecedented, and eminently disgraceful to our national character. Prescrip ions and persecutions of the most infamous character had been perpetrated upon that in receiving a strip earsenings which if they had hein; protoriptions and persecutions which if they had seen instituted in the old country, would have stifted been inshifested in the old country, would have surred oven the down-trodden national ties of Europe to a bloody resistance, and would have hurled many a monarch from his throne. Thank God! In this country we need no war to accomplish a revolution. There is a ballot-box, a public press, an oranipotent public opinion—and to those agencies he could cheerfully commit the defence of American liberty.
