Burton it is attact that he built the National Theatre, at Ninth and Chestnut streets, in this city. As the completion of the mannificent hotel at that point is now attracting universal attention to the spot, it would be as we'll be correct this wintake. The round had no buildines upon it, except the dwelling of Mr. John M. Scott, at the southeast corner of Ninth and Chestnut streets, until about the year 1837, when the Philadelphia Museum building was erepted on the southern end of the lot, with its front on Ninth street. This huge structure was occupied for B at time by the Philadelphia Museum, and by the Chinese Museum. The latter was taken to Encland, where, we also believe, it still remains, and the goldection up stairs was	nosor to this at our yesterday's prices.
