The fashion of having afternoon performances, oddly enough called Matinées, has now become established here, and is decidedly ropular. Parents, who care for the health of their children, object to trusting them out in the night air, are glad enough to take them to places of amusement at an early hour in the afternoon, and give them a treat which lasts two or three hours. At the National Theatre, this afternoon, the Elephant of Siam, one of the most superb spectacle dramss we ever saw, will be performed, we believe, for the last time. In addition, the usual scenes in the circle will be given, including Dan Rico's own eccentric and amusing talk, and the deshing equestrian feats of Mad'lle Ella Zoyara, who has made what is called "a sensation," in | but who better deserve to make these fortunes than this circlo. traordinary piece of management and wire-pulling upon the page of political history. As I said in one of my letters, Mr. Witte's friends were too confident and too merourial. They sustained him not with the warm andor of devoted friendship, but simply because he was (as a popular speaker) an available man. If he could harp relied even upon his own spolessed friends, he would most cortainly have been the hominge. This was the general opinion among the delegates. ^{1,1} WASHINGTON, March 2, 1860.
