shared his griefs as a strolling actor, and partics pated in his triumphs as the great master of the American stage. But; somehow or other, my mind had become impressed with the idea that

Mr. Forrest was morose and hypercritical little disposed to open his heart to those who liked him, and still less willing to extend a welcome to a stranger like myself. But I had seen Independence Hall, Girard College, Fairmount, and the Mint; had visited your great squares; had enjoyed a ride over your unequalled city railroads, and had generally collected anough information to fill half a dozen columns of the St. Louis Republican-all relating to the le sources and population, and the characteris tics of Philadelphia; and finally, one dull afternoon, I concluded that the next morning I would run the risk, and pay a visit to Edwin Forrest.

1 was directed by the agreeable chief clerk of the Continental to take the Fifteenth-stree car until I came to Master street, which I accordingly did, and about half past nine o'clock in the morning I arrived at Mr. Forrest's resilence, which is situated at the corner of Master and Broad streets. It is a large, substan tial building, with a brown-stone front, the lot of which extends, I should say, about one undred and fifty feet on Broad street, and unning back some two hundred ford. The house itself presents a front of some fifty and has a depth of one hundred and thirty five feet. There is an air of comfort and in dustry about it that displays the presence of female thrift and attention.

I rung the bell, and was soon admitted by a servant girl, who received my card and letter. and carried them to Mr. Forrest. She returned for answer that he was at home, but in his garden, and requested me to follow her.

I did so, and found the tragedian in the space behind his house, busily engaged watching the operations of some men he had em-

Having vis nembers of his family --- his unmarried sisers-ladies of great worth, and warmly beloved by a large circle of friends. In conversing with him I discovered that he had not entirely abandoned the idea of reappearing upon the stage. He is in such fine preservation, and looks so well, his voice is so full, round and clear, and his interest in the pro-gress of theatricals so animated, that I do not see how he can resist yielding to the general expectation that he should resume his profes-sion. I understand that a number of the leading citizens of Philadelphia, headed by Mr. Joséph Harrison, have frequently ex-prossed a wish that he should consent to the grees of the spectal consent to the grees of the spectal consent to the proposition to give a series of personations of his great characters, at your Agademy of Nume. In politics (everybody talks politics now) Mr. Forrest volunteered his opinions, and with great candor and clearness announced himself a Douglas Democrat, exhibiting as thorough a knowledge of the difference between the difference here and the series of the similar for th of the idea that his dream was passing before him, to use the expression of Count de Segur, "in a mingled mass of smoke and flame."
