he has accordingly chosen that class of our community upon which to operate. It is well to remind. Mr. REED that no public man in our midst is better known to these classes than himself. Seeing how wholly selfish all his aims, are, and how fruitless the effort to rally support to a ticket the success of which must end in the overthrow of all our interests, manufacturing, mechanical, and commercial, these ment regard his presumption with mingled feelings of pity and contempt. When , Mr. REED was a Whig (and that was only a few years ago) he had some right to address those with whom he was in intimate relation. When in 1856 he had turned Democrat, they listened to his counsel as to the impressions of a convert, anxious to see by what processes of reason he came, to renounce his faith. But when in 1860 he again turns his coat, and abandons the principles and the interests which he so lately herished and supported, and enlists himself under the banner of Slavery and Disunion, how can he expect that the merchants and manufacturers of Philadelphia will pay any heed to his artful exhortations, or listen to his paerile arguments in favor of a policy which finds no favor here except with mer who, like Mr. REED, have been or are now the e counting-rooms and factories to which he has lately sent it.
