The friends of Mr. Adams adopted the black cookade as the distinguishing badge, and men by an unconvolues impulse looked to the bat of every one they met, rather than at his face, to see whether or not he wors the parti-san budge, that they might determine whether to regard him as a friend or an enemy. Farty spirit ran vory high in those times; friendships were broken by political differences between intimate friends, and men who had been acquaintances all their lives crossed the street to avoid meeting each other.
