teers are too precious to be sacrificed in fruitless sallies, or by the ignorance or misappre hension of those commanding them. We deplore this disaster, and monrn the melancholy fate of the brave men who have fallen; but it teaches discretion to those in authority, and shows our soldiers that rashness is not valor, nor reckless daring true military courage. The lesson will not be without its uses, however dearly we may have paid for it.

Military Movements. There is every indication of an approaching conflict in Virginia, and we can hardly expect to see the "month of battles" pass by without a fearful contest between the Federal army and the rebels. The campaign thus far has been a mere succession of strategical movements on both sides. It is hard to realize that it is not two months since the people of the North were anxions for the safety of the capital, and yet in these two months we have gained many victories. In a military sense, we have made Washington impregnable, fortified ourselves in Virginia, occupied Baltimore, crushed out treason in Missouri, raised the flag of the Union in Western Virginia and placed Kentucky on her good behavior In a moral sense, we have conquered faction st home, and merged all feelings of partisanship into a feeling of patriotism. We begin to know ourselves, and, although it may be a feeling of pride which prompts the thought, we are beginning to understand that true nobleness of heart, inflexibility of purpose, and devotion to the laws, which constitutes the true American character.

It is important, for the safety of Maryland and Pennsylvania, that the rebel troops should be driven from their present position at Harper's Ferry. A movement of this nature is rendered necessary as a measure of selfdefence. Harper's Ferry is within two days' forced march of Pennsylvania, and a sufficiently strong force could leave that position rity, but it must be remembered that a defeat speak except from uncertain newspaper stateforce does not outnumber the force under command of General PATTERSON.
