In their address to the country they give us some startling facts in relation to the mortality which generally exists among soldiers. We are teld that among regular troops four soldiers die of dis. eases incident to camp life for one that falls in battle, and that among volunteers the average is much greater. The mortality, we might add, does not generally cease with the war, and thousands go home with the seeds of deail in their systems, only to fall, in the course of : few months, or a few years, into an untimely

In a life of peace we know how much de pends upon what we eat and drink, and the quality of the clothing we wear. The current of health is often turned into a channel of sickness by the most trivial circumstance Thin shoes in a snow-storm ; an extra waltz an an evening party ; a broken pane in a chambe window; an unripe or unpalatable fruit; a dis regard of the dinner hour; or any of the simple indiscretions which the most prudent men will occasionally commit, have been the meanof bringing many from blooming health to a bed of sickness, and, perhaps, to the coffia. If, then, we pay so much regard to ourselver when we are sheltered by home and in the enjoyment of its comforts, why should it not be eased when we enter into a camp ane abandon the pleasures and privileges which civilization and peace bestow upon us? Cam; life has a tendency to be a careless life, when it should be the most careful.

In their address the members of the Commission notice the evils which tend to spread mortality among the troops. The differencbetween food well prepared and that crudely prepared makes a change of forty per cent. in the available strength and efficiency of a regment. The quality of water furnished then is most important, and we are pained to see it stated that many of our troops are already suffering from the want of properly-cooked food and thoroughly-purified water. These two very important matters deserve the imme diate attention of the Government, and should be attended to without even the interforence
