weather he would be brief—not for his own sake, although he felt it severely—but for the comfort of his congregation. Then, stating his subject, he said that the world's history would bear him out in the assertion that prosperity, peace, and comfort, whether in the iamily, the community, or the nation, depended in a large degree upon the amount of union pervading them. This was pre-eminently true also of the Church of God. Union in the Church, therefore, would be his theme, and if he alluded to anything outside of that it would only be for the sake of illustration.
