THURSDAY, JULY 11, 1861.

Never flint that standard sheet!
Where breathes the sea but falls not
And Freedom's banner streaming 'er us!

The Distress among the Laboring Classes.

The question of providing relief for those who may have been driven from employment by the existing crisis is being agitated among our citizens. We have seen meetings among the workmen. Some of them were marked with temperance of spirit and dignity, while in others we could trace that spirit of demagoguism which is always introduced upon the subject of relief for the poor.

We have no reliable data on which to base an opinion of our own.

We have no reliable data on which to base an opinion of our own. We have given the subject some attention, but it is impossible to say with any accuracy of the number of unemployed. One sees disordered commerce and mercantile failure—the other, idle junks and high prices for food.

War Telegrams.

In times of war, it cannot be expected that the reports of skirmishes and battles should be so numerous, who are not making a profession of arms, and the facts of our progress are open, and the facts of our progress are open, and the facts of our progress are open.

The Policy of Kentucky.

The correspondence of the Press. The act is not what we have heard of with the force of mid-summer heat. The act is not what we have heard of with the force of mid-summer heat.
