ote. [Great applanse.] One of the boldest death of the man, who, however criticised during his eventful struggle with Power, was the leader of the most heroic, disinterested protest against political crime in high places our New World has ever known. The men engaged with Douglas, in this protest, were Democrats whose whole experience had been that of close relationship with Southern states. men, and that of earnest devotion to Southern rights. When they took up arms against their rights. When they took up arms against their party organization, it was not without reluc-tance. When they arrayed themselves against an Administration new in office, and in the full possession of undisposed of patronage, they did not do so without counting the cost of the experiment. They were reminded of others, in bygone days, who had grappled with power and had fallen under its severe displeasance: but they were men of from nerve displeasure ; but they were men of iron nerve and conscientious convictions. They felt that, and conscientious convictions. They felt that, whatever might happen to them, the truths they advocated must triumph, and so they persevered till the whole work of destiny was completed.
