The Parrott gun, made by the eminent founder at West Point, is a simple, workmanlike-looking piece of artillery, with a thick iron band shrunk on over the breech, and its range is nearly as great as that of the Armstrong, and its cost very much less. The force of field artillery under McClellan is now very considerable, and it will surprise me very much if the Confederates have anything like equal metal. The general has exerted himself greatly to advance this arm of his service towards efficiency, and he has been much assisted by the chief of field ordnance, Brigadier General Barry, of the regular United States artillery. The in-tensity of feeling in the South is described to be greater than ever. Their resolution is adamant, and if they have, like the Federalists, Blair and Fremont, controversies, they are kept in the dark. The discipline of both armies may be on a par, but I am include to thick that in actual drill the Northern troops do not improve more rapidly, and are not better in hand than the Southerners. It is a somewhat quaint study to observe the prostration of the journals before the military power—how they fawn, and cringe, and flatter. But all will not do. The puissant finger is on their nostril, and they are well nigh smothored for want of fresh air.
