Spring Garden Fire Insurance Company, for the year 1861, seems more than herotofore to warrant the public confidence, which is rapidly placing it among the prominent offices of the city, both in respect to its assets and annual amount of business. The president of the company, with a commendable willingness, submits to the stockholders the mest full, clear, and specific statement of the listhiities, assets, condition, and transactions, without any concealment or prevarication. In fact, he relies in the faith that the widest publicity given to the company's affairs is the surest road to public confidence. And the officers and directors feel convinced that straightforwardness should prevail in its whole management, for that has been the cause of the company's late success. The statements submitted bring up the condition of the company to January 1, 1862, and are so complete and intelligible an exposition of its affairs as to be understood by all prevent, and meet with the decided and unanimous approval of the stockholders. The President, in his remarks, paused a high sulegium on the old lite insurance companies of the city of Philadelphia. That while backing institutions, saving funds, and loan companies had closed their doors, ruining stockholders and depositors, not a single instance had occurred of a fire insurance company, with its capital paid in, in this city, having failed or refused the payment of their inbilities—reflecting the true character of our citizens who are interested in them. Frequent losses had overtaken theu, and had impaired their capital, but never had they closed their doors, and tney should, as they justly deserve, receive the support of our merchants and business men in preference to foreign institutions. Wo may further add, as a specimon of the judicious management of the directors and officers, that the doubtful debts due to the company, extending over a period of ten year, amounted to only $150. Spring Garden Fire Insurance Company, for the year 1861, seems more than herotofore to warrant the public confidence, which is rapidly placing it among the prominent offices of the city, both in respect to its assets and annual amount of business. The president of the company, with a commendable willingness, submits to the stockholders the meet full, clear, and specific statement of the liabilities, assets, condition, and transactions, without any concealment or prevarication. In fact, he relies in the faith that the widest publicity given to the company's affairs is the surest road to public confidence. And the officers and directors feel convinced that straightforwardness should prevail in its whole management, for that has been the cause of the company's late success. The statements submitted bring up the condition of the company to January 1, 1862, and are so complete and intelligible on exposition of its affairs as to be understood by all prevent, and meet with the decided and unanimous approval of the stockholders. The Fresident, in his remarks, passed a high sulegium on the old lire insurance companies of the city of Philadelphia. That while banking institutions, saving funds, and loan companies bad closed their doors, ruining stockholders and depositors, not a single instance had occurred of a fire insurance company, with its capital paid in, is this city, having failed or refused the payment of their inbilities—reflecting the true character of our citizens who are interested in them. Frequent losses had overtaken them, and had impaired their capital, but never had they closed their doors, and truy should, as they justly deserve, receive the support of our merchants and business men in preference to foreign institutions. We may further add, as a specimen of the judicious management of the directors and officers, that the doubtful debts due to the company, extending over a period of ten years, amounted to only $150. Spring Garden Fire Insurance Company, for the year 1801, teems more than herotofore to warrant the public confidence, which is rapidly placing it among the prominent offices of the city, both in respect to its assets and amount of business. The president of the company, with a commendable willinguess, submits to the stockholders the mest full, clear, and specific statement of the liabilities, assets, condition, and transactions, without any concealment or prevarication. In fact, he relies in the faith that the widest publicity given to the company's affairs is the surest road to public confidence. And the officers and directors feel convinced that straightforwardness should prevail in its whole management, for that has been the cause of the company's late auccess. The statements submitted bring up the condition of the company to January 1, 1862, and are so complete and intelligible on exposition of its affairs as to be understood by all present, and meet with the decided and unanimous approval of the stockholders. The President, in his remarks, passed a high enlogium on the old lire insurance company with its capital paid in, in this claim to the city of Philadelphia. That while banking institutions, saving funds, and loan companies bad closed their doors, ruining stockholders and depositors, not a single instance had occurred of a fire insurance company, with its capital paid in, in this city, having failed or refused the payment of their inhilities—reflecting the true character of our citizens who are interested in them. Frequent losses had overtaken them, and had impaired their capital, but merchant and busifiess men in preference to foreign institutions. We may further add, as a specimen of the indicious management of the directors and officers, that the doubtful debts due to the company, extending over a period of ten years, amounted to only 8160. Spring Garden Fire Insurance Company, for the year 1861, teems more than herotofore to warrant the public confidence, which is rapidly placing it among the prominent offices of the city, both in respect to its assets and amount of business. The president of the company, with a commendable willingness, submits to the stockholders the meter full, clear, and specific statement of the liabilities, assets, condition, and transactions, without any concealment or prevarication. In fact, he relies in the faith that the widest publicity given to the company's affairs is the surest road to public confidence. And the officers and directors feel convinced that 'straightforwardness should prevail in its whole management, for that has been the cause of the company's late auccess. The statements submitted bring up the condition of the company to January 1, 1862, and are so complete and intelligible on exposition of its affairs as to be understood by ull prevent, and meet with the decided and unanimous approved of the stockholders. The President, in his remarks, passed a high enlogium on the old fire insurance companies of the city of Philadelphia. That while banking institutions, saving funds, and loan companies had closed their doors, ruining stockholders and depositors, not a single instance had occurred of a fire insurance company, with its capital paid in, faiths city, having failed or refused the payment of their inhibitives—reflecting the true character of our citizens who are interested in them. Frequent losses had overtaken then, and had impaired their capital, but never had they closed their doors, and they should, as they justly deserve, receive the support of our merchants and builbees men in preference to foroign institutions. We may further add, as a specimen of the judicious management of the directors and officers, that the doubtful debta-due to the company, extending over a period of ten years, amounted to only slide. Spring Gatden Fire Insurance Company, for the year 1801, recess more than heretofore to warrant the public confidence, which fa rapidly placing it among the prominent offices of the city, both in respect to its assets and annual amount of business. The president of the company, with a commendable willinguess, submits to the stockholders the nurst full, clear, and specific statement of the liabilities, assets, condition, and transactions, without sury concealment or prevariation. In fact, he relies in the faith that the widest publicity given to the company's affairs is the surest road to public confidence. And the officers and directors feet convinced that straightfurwardness should prevail in its whole management, for that has been the canes of the company's late success. The statements submitted bring up the condition of the company to January 1, 1802, and are so complete and intelligible on exposition of its affairs as to be understood by all present, and meet with the decided and unanimous approval of the siockholders. The President, in his remarks, pawed a high subgium on the old lire huarance companies of the city of Philadelphia. That while backing institutions, saving funda, and from companies had closed their doors, ruining stockholders and depositors, not a single instance had occurred of a fire insurance company, with its capital paid in, is this city, having failed or refused the payment of their indiffuse-reflecting the true character of our citizens who are interested in them. Frequent losses had overtaken them, and had impaired their capital, but never had they closed their doors, and they should, as they justly deserve, receive the support of our merchants and business men in preference to foreign institutions. We may further add, as a specimen of the indicious management of the directors and officers, that the doubtful debt-due to the company, cretending over a period of ten years, amounted to only $\frac{1}{2}$ in the state of the past year.
