The application made by the preacher of this subject, to his leagers, was, that they only estimated this life rightly when they looked upon it as David did in the test—as a pilorimage. "For I a stranger and a sojourner." was his language. And this was not only Christian but it was philosophical. We all know that the treasures of hits world were not enduring; there was no togo in them that the soul could lay hold noon, and as, with perfect satisfaction, "Whis is mine forever."
To illustrate this instability of all mere earthly things, the preacher briedly recommted the leading objects to which we are word to cling. It was no discredit or disadvantage to a man if God had given him an at un do nee of this world's goods, and houses, and houses, and houses, include he held them loosely. The danger was in grasping them—in transferring the affoctions from the Giver to the gift.
Then, again, if we realized, in fact, that we were pillegins we should be anxious for this we would always be ready to meet it, which we could not be unless we were conscious for this we would always be ready to meet it, which we could not be unless we were conclusions for the short, it remained, that here with they that a more it is short; it remained, that here with they that any moment in order to "depart and be with Christ."
