English Impressions of the Rappahannock Campaign.

English impressions upon the campaign of General Hooker, before the battle of the Rappahannock, differ widely in some respects, but are still intelligent. The Times writes that other journals say high compliments to the enterprise of General Hooker, and even in an adverse report, see no reason for despair.

From the London Globe. The reports from America, which we publish today, show that General Hooker had a long and arduous march to a point of meeting Gen. Lee's army, but the march was not without its difficulties, and the operations of the Rappahannock campaign, which were so successful in the eyes of the public, were not without their difficulties.
