OSEPH O. GRUBB. Beecher and Switzerland,

To the Edditor of The Press:

Sin: It was the writer's good fortune to spend a somewhat longer period than "three memorable weeks" in the laid where, according to Mr. Beecher, "for mere physical things all good Americans should go," and "where notitie is so transcendently beautiful and men so wretched." Having had the privilege of talking with, as well as of "looking at the people," the impressions he received during a tour of several months in Switzerland were such as to confirm his previously adopted ideas that the Swiss were a brave, industrious, and ingenious nation. In the course of his wainderings, he saw, indeed, several cretins and a few cases of goitre, but to have said on that account that "of all wretched creatures" he "never saw any more so than the Swiss," would have been as unjust and untrue as it would be to affirm that, because there are lazzaroni and banditti in Italy, the Italians are a nation of beggars and robbers; or, to base an equally sweeping denunciation of the character of Mr. Beecher's fellow-citizens, upon a glance at the demireps in the casinos and gambling dens of New York. The tourist may have been an indifferently acute observer, and must confess that he did not perceive the "toil," "imprisonment and trudgery." which made the people prematurely decrepid, nor did he notice any "children" that "were boin a hundred years old." He visited several universities, and sther educational institutions, and a number of manufactories, and also observed what appeared to be rather a remarkable degree of progress in agriculture, for a land little more than two hundred miens, laciers, barren rocks, lakes, and rivers. He found that those same "wretched creatures" had a literature; that they had sharply defined ideas of liberty and human rights, and was much more strongly inclined to praise than to depreciate a people whose separate nationality had existed for centuries, and who had firmly established a republican government in the midst of despotisms pressing around and a Beecher and Switzerland FURNESS, BRINLEY & CO., A SSISTANT QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE.
