"Colonel" Jewett Saves the Union.

It is plain that "Colonel" Jewett cannot be deterred from writing letters to the President by any trivial circumstance as the refusal of Mr. LINCOLN, expressed through his private secretary, Mr. HAY, to open these frank and amiable epistles. Strong in the faith that the pen is mightier than the sword, and that the United States does not rigorously require prepayment of letter postage, the indefatigable Colonel, with something of the sublime persistency of St. Peter's letters, has been addressing two more letters to President Lincoln. Both of these are characteristic specimens in style and rhetoric; and in the mere fact of his emitting the definite article "the" so frequently before his substantives, we are permitted to have a glimpse at the inner life of a busy master-spirit, whose hands are too full controlling the destinies of nations to attend to details of grammar. The error of omission first arises from the necessity of economy in telegraphing to the Emperor NAPOLÉON; but it detracts so greatly from the dignity of style as requisite in the notes of a statesman that he has now given up both ends and a troublesome epigraph, that it should clearly be discontinued. "Colonel" Jewett might make a tolerable plenipotentiary but for two intolerable faults that mark all his official effusions: They are slightly rattle-brained, and slightly inconsistent. In his first letter to the President he says: "I know that, upon the withdrawal of your note addressed 'To whom it may concern' the South will immediately commence its war of treason to us for peace." I do, therefore, appeal upon you the duty and policy of reopening negotiations at Niagara with the gentlemen who have now general powers, and that Mr. GALTIER be re-empowered to bring about this desirable result." In his second letter he says to Mr. LINCOLN: "It is now understood that the war and peace elements will unite at Chicago under a peace platform meeting the approbation of the South. This will insure your defeat. Turn, therefore, I beseech you to turn your attention, during the few months remaining, to the salvation of this country, through an armistice and a coalition, unconditional, or be prepared to receive the curse of future generations." Perhaps "Colonel" Jewett has authority to make the sake of "the salvation of the country." But will not the country be inevitably saved if the Chicago nominee be elected by the combined disloyal vote of the Democratic party? For in that event, the loyal voters of the country will be in the minority, and as loyal minorities never succeed in rebel against the constituted authorities, the Union would necessarily be restored without further fighting or parley.

Gold and its Trade Moral.

The gold sent to Europe from New York, on last Saturday, was $350,000, and a further sum of $60,000 was taken away by the banks.

It is proper, level, under such circumstances, that it not for the Government demand for it, but for the banks, to pay the debt, in specie, the only demand part of our financial policy; but which, if adopted, cannot be changed without the advice of the public creditors.
