Besides, instead of an aged man, whose the only blow that it received during the twenty one years of wedded life; The death of Prince Albert was a great shock come to forget that he was a foreigner. They even condoned the additional offence of his being a German. They rather wondered at than complained of his cold pensity for saving money-which, by the way, enabled him to bequeath $5,000,000 to his family. They saw, with satisfaction, that he was an excellent husband, a loving father, and a good citizen. He had. bestowed his patronage, if he did not give his money, to various projects for bettering the moral and physical condition of the laboring classes, and their gratitude was deep. When he died, in December, 1861. after only a few days illness, and was liitle more than forty at the time, English society received a shock which thrilled through its entire frame. Albert was a good, if not a great man, and a nation knew it. His widow has not yet seen fit to pardon Providence for having removed him; his children need desire no better than to live as nobly as their father, to die as much lamented. The grief of England on the death of Prince Albert was neither so deep, heartfelt, and lasting, as that which arose when the Princess Charlotte of Wales died, at Claremont, in 1817, some seventeen months after her marriage with Prince Leopoldnow King of the Belgians. The hopes of the British nation had been deeply interested in that young lady, the only legitimate child of George, Prince of Wales, who was then Regent of the empire during his father's hopeless illness. She was eminently the idol of the people, who also hated and despised her father, one of the worst men then upon earth. They looked forward, in pleased expectancy, to the time when she should reign over them, hoping, from her amiable and noble character, that she would eclipse the renown of Elizabeth as much as her virtues outnumbered those of the absolute daughter of the haughty Tudor line. Her marriage was understood to have been one purely of affection. Her wedded life was truly happy. She gave birth to a still-born male child, and died not many hours afterwards, grieving only for the husband of her heart, whom she left behind. The grief expressed by the people for her death was entirely without any parallel in England. Her loss was almost as generally and deeply lamented as though she had been a member of every family in the Kingdom. Almost every person went into mourning for her. The noble stanzas in the Fourth Canto of "Childe Harold" truly describe the dismay, the grief which arose when the Princess Charlotte died. Great, too, was the shock to England when, in the last week of October, 1805, news came that the combined fleets of France and Spain had been met, battled with, and literally annihilated, off Trafalgar-but that this great victory was won with the life of Nelson, who commanded the British fleet. He was only forty-seven when he died-as he had wished to die, in the hour of victory. In had health, enfeebled, emaciated, having lost his right arm and an eye in previous battles, he embarked for the last time, at a few hours' notion, the repeal of the oppressive Corn life had exceeded the "three score years Laws which made bread costly, and the and ten," mentioned by the Psalmist, there | reduction of Taxation, were great national was a new monarch-a young girl, still in | boons, and these were of his bestowing. her teens, well brought up by a careful and He not only perilled, but actually lost judicious mother. All the world became office, in 1846, by insisting that bread involuntarily interested in this young and should not be taxed. At his death, though exalted personage, and her reign has been out of office; Sir Robert Peel was more very fortunate on the whole. Her domes- powerful, in and out of Parliament, than tic happiness has been unusually great- the Cabinet (Russell's) which had supthe unexpected death of her husband being planted him. A great public loss was his death, and it may be said that he was most deeply lamented by the laboring classes. Two years later, (September 14, 1852,) to the heart of England. The people had | the Duke of Wellington also paid the last great debt of nature. He had reached the great age of 88, and had passed nearly sixty years in the public service of his dered at than complained of his cold country. Honors, filtes, wealth, offices and reserved manner, and his decided pro- Thad basis heaped upon him, and he had occupied the highest stations in the military and civil services. He had obtained great popularity; he had been the victim, for a time, of political obloquy, but he had outlived all antagonism. The nation recognized that Duty had ever been at once the impulse of his head and, the principle of his heart. He was placed in St. Paul's Cathedral, close by the remains of Nelson. London was in grief as well as in black when his functal procession passed through it. Parliament granted $400,000 for its cost. Statues and monuments were voted to him, as to Peel two years before. There were funeral services in his honor, at Vienna and Madada. More than all, from the Sovereign, whose friend and counsellor he had been, down to her lowest stilliet, England mourned for her gentle hearted "Iron Duke." a Peel and Wellington saw their respec tive missions fulfilled, their work completed and successful. Our own martyrpatriot was not so, fortunate as to witness the final triumph of his honest and persistent policy, but enough of the result was visible to assure him that what he would have died for, and what he did die for, was accomplished. If we understand foreign nations, and chiefly England, which frequently is just and magnanimous, the grief at the murder of our President will be as deep and true as the shock has been awful and sudden. Already, though not yet has "dust to dust" returned, he is an historical character. He will rank among those who have labored to better mankind, and has sealed his truth and pure patriot ism with his blood as a Martyr. Death of Dr. Valentine Mott. lessor Valenthie Mott died on Wednesday las at his residence in Gramerey Park, New York, at the advanced age of eighty years. Dr. Mott was a Eative and one of the cldest inhabitants of New York city. He was known to the medical profession usder the dignified title of the Father of Surgery in America, and decidedly occupied the foremos renk in medicine and surgery in the city of New York, if not on this continent. Dr. Mott had obtained an international reputation-a rare achieve-ment for an American professor. He was born at Glen Cove, Long Island, August 20, 1785; gradu-ated at Columbia College in 1806, and then followed up his studies at the London and Edinburg hospi-tals. For thirty years he has lectured before different colleges in this city. His skill in surgical operations was extraordinary, having performed many of the feats deemed impos sible. Sir Astley Cooper said of him: "He has performed more of the great operations than any man living, or that ever did live." Dr. Mott is the anthor of geveral standard works in the higher and noro complex-branches of surgical anatomy and chysiology. From 1809 to 1813 he was Professor of rgery in Columbia College, and until 1825 held the same chair in the College of Physicians and Surgeens. With an interval of four years' service in the short-lived Rutger's Medical College, he re-turned to the College of Physicians and Surgeons, passing thence to the University Medical College, of which he was a founder, as Professor of Surgery and Relative Anatomy. Of the latter science, im-measurably important to surgery, he is declared the author. But his brilliant reputation, says a high authority, " is mainly due to his original operations as a surgeon. As carly as 1818 Dr. Mott placed a ligature around the bracheocephalic trunk, or arteria innominata, only two inches from the heart, for tice. The idol of the navy, which was then England's greatest strength, the peo-ple dearly loved him, and truly mourned over him. They went, most bitterly, as exected the entire right sublaviale for malignant disportain point is gained by the easy and convenient access for visitors obtained by locating the galleries at a small elevation from the ground floor, we will see at once the good judgment exercised in this por-tion of the design. If the building was intended for-the accommodation of artists merely it might have been raised a story or two higher, devoted to the purpose of studios, and thus have given a more im-posing effect externally. But no such intention was contemplated. The building is for the benotic of the public, not for the artists; the latter having no claim upon the intettution, except for the extinition of their works, which is of as much advantage to the public, not for the artists; the latter having no claim upon the intettution, except for the extinition of their works, which is of as much advantage to the public as to themelves. The exterior of the building is beautiful and pic-turseque. The walls of the basement story are of Westchester county gray marble, with bands of Notth river "graywacke." The walls of the first story are of white marble, with finding bands, and of the third story of white and gray marble, in small oblong blocks, forming a pattern of checkerwork. The building is surmounted by a rich arcoaded cor-nice of white marble, which adds materially to the appearance of the codifice. The main entrance, which is on Twenty-third fut arct, is approached by a chois pice of work-manchie, with a heavy balastrade of the same material. Under the platform is a triple arcade, the pilasters and arch of which are elaborately "Wrvd with iters, lillies, and other flowers of the field and garden. This is an exquisite piceo of work-manchie, with a marble, with an elaborate play, broad Gothio arch. A broad archivolt, en-riately white and gray, grings from columns, two on each side, of red Vermont marble, with white marble, broad Gothio arch. Shon after 6 o'clock the inauguration ceremonies commenced with appro-priate prayer by Rev. Df. 'Adams, siter which Mr. D. Huntington, president of the Academy, deliver-ed an address describing the origin of the Academy, its early struggles, and final success, after forty years' labor. For twenty years the Academy had no home until now, and he congratulated the exists and those who had aided them at the result they witnessed on that occasion. He appealed to the fellows of the insti-tion-the artists and the students-to fulfil their sacred duites towards the furtherance of art in the new ers of peace and prosperity which was open before us. He made a pathetic allusion to the death of Mr. Lincoin, which had caused the post-pomement of the inauguration, which depost pomement of the inauguration, which desized the stince 1855 until the present subjectors time the tribes of art had dwelf in tents, but now they had a permanent home. At first he was increduous that the refinement of the serving; but the spiendit hall in which they met to-night, with firs variety of de-line the sto of the serving to the spiendit hall in which they met to-night, with its variety of de-lineations of art in every form, was a rebuke to his increal lite. in which they met to-night, with its variety of de-lineations of art in every form, was a rebuke to his incredulity. Upon the whole, the scene was one of remarkable brillincer, and gave promise of a bright era in ast in the metropolis of the country. There could not have been less than two thousand persons present, among whom we observed Hon. George Bancorott and other distinguished gentlemen.
