L'ABRIGAINE.—There is a difference of opinion as to the success of this opera, in Paris. Some writers dealers it to be the noblest of all Meyerbeer's operas, while others intimate that it is hardly the operas, while others intimate that it is found fault bit that was expected. The libretto is found fault bit that was expected. The libretto is found fault bit that was expected. The libretto is found fault bit that was expected. The opera is far too long, and there is much talk of omitting the second act altogether. The correspondent of the London Musical World says that "the judgment passed the first night on the music has been confirmed. The pieces which pleased most and were most applaued at the first representation seem to have pleased most and were appleaded most and were explained at the first representation, and not less scriking than the conspiration seem in the 'Huguenots', a chorus of women and prayer in double choir in third act; nearly the entire of the fourth act, particularly the grand duet for Scilika and Vasco; and, in the fifth sot, the duet for two women, the unison phrase for all the vicling, tenors, vicloncellos, clarionets and bassoons, without accompaniment, commencing the second lableau, which created a prodigious sensation, and the effect of which it is almost impossible to conceive, and Scilika's desations, in the score should be reserved for the less scene. I have no doubt, when all is arranged and determined, when the opera is reduced within proper limits, when the librato has been made familiar, and its crudities and shortcomings are left unminded, when the expected on spirit of their parts, not an effort and a timidity, when the 'big ship' has been taught to behave itself more handsomely, or is sunk altogether in the Dead See of Condemnation, that the 'Africane' will be judged worthy of the high expectations formed of it, worthy of the deathless renown of the composer; in which he accepts an invitation te dize with Rossini by saying that in getting the le Shall our brave soldiers be well entertained on thei eturn?
