THURSDAY, AUGUST 31, 1865. TEXAS PAPERS-No. 10.

In calculating the price of wool, a difference of one-third must be made against the un-washed. It is calculated that about that proportion is taken out of the weight in THE WASHING.

The majority of wool-growers shear their sheep dry, and sell the wool in the dirt. Of those who do wash, not one in ten makes a clean job of it. The rest build an open pen on the side of a hill, close to a steep river-bank, where the water is deep; the pen simply consisting of two wings starting on the river-bank at two posts a rod or two apart, and running ack up the hill like the letter V. widening out from the river. Into this the flock is driven, and then rushed by the dogsover the bank through the narrow opening into the river below. They all swim down the current, and are finally permitted to land on some clean, level place below, and taken back to their beding-ground "washed for market."
SHEARING AND PACKING.

SHEARING AND FACKING.
Shearers go through the country in April and May, shearing at from five to eight cents per head, and tying the fleeces for sacking. The fleece is spread out upon a large table, outside up, the edges folded in, and then rolled up close, and tied with twine. Sacks are made about eight feet long, and of two-and-a-half breadths of heavy muslin, left open at one end. A hoop of iron, or grane-vine is made, just A hoop of iron, or grape-vine is made, just large enough to stretch the open end over it, which being done and sewed, the sack is hung up clear from the ground by a rope fastened to each side of the hoop, and then flung over the limb of a tree. A few fleeces are thrown in, when one man climbs in, and with his feet packs in and treads down what another throws up to him; and so the sack is filled. Then the hoop is taken off and the end sewed up, and the wool is ready for market. The longer it kept the heavier it grows; so nothing is lost by laying awhile after sacking. Sales are usually made upon the ranch, and without further trouble to the owner. THE DAILY ROUTINE of a shepherd's life is about this: Early in the morning he goes into his pens, looks out all that are needing particular attention, has them caught by his dog or does it himself with a crook, or by the leg (no good shepherd ever catches by the wool, it hurts the sheep), and after doing his doctoring of sore feet and accidental hurts, goes to breakfast. This over, and his dog fed, he puts in his scrip bread and meat enough for two dinners, opens his pens, and follows his sheep wherever they choose to go through the day, keeping them always in sight, and suffering none to stray away. This he dres by his dog, and a good dog is worth two men, in driving in and keeping the flock together. Through the heat of the day, the sheep lie in the shade, and towards night turn homeward, and about sunset are penned up securely till morning again. It is an easy, lazy life, and shepherds get but small pay.

WOLVES, DOGS, AND HOOS,

Are the shepherds bane; and his folds should be wolf and hog tight. A hungry one should be wolf and hog tight. A hungry one of either will attack the flock, either in the pen or on the prairies; and if not driven off kill a half a hundred at a time. The hogs only attack the lambs, but are terribly destructive in early spring. In some regions, the woods and river bottoms are full of hogs that are will in overything, save carrying a mark in the ear, and heing the property of some body, who, when the right time comes, will shoot them as they run, and garnlah the beams of his smoke houses with their most fatted flitches and oily hams. The little lambs would stand but a poor chance of ever being sheared, if loft to dight their own way with these long-tusked savages. But as no shepherd at a hog-owner, ristless soon give way to wool, and pork goos down, while mutton comes up. The hog-owners grumble awhile, but finally move their endangered stock to safer localities. The woives and dogs are smeaking murderers; and it is only now and then that the bullet finds one out and lays him out as well. But when they get too troublesome for longer endurance, the great to troublesome for longer endurance, the great to the providence of the property in the shelphors to do the same, and waits the motions of Providence. Growling and snarling is the fashionable music in that locality for a night or two, but thereafterwards, wolf and dogskins are cheap for a yeal?

The shepherd dogs are well-trained, course gound is little fellows, always ready to either bark or bite at any interiore, but no match to this neighbors to do the same, and waits the notions of Providence. Growling and snarling is the fashionable music in that locality for a night or two, but thereafterwards, wolf and dogskins are cheap for a yeal?

The shepherd dogs are well-trained, course grow of the shepherd dogs are well-trained, course grow of the shepherd dogs are well-trained, course grow of the sheper dogs are well-trained, course grow of the sheper dogs are well-trained, course grounds, closed in for a fight with a full-grown board of the shear of either will attack the flock, either in the pen or on the prairies; and if not driven off, kill a half a hundred at a time. Having bought, (often but few acres holding the wood and water—for cattle and horses run where they please,) built his pens and cabin, the new beginner buys as many cattle as he has money to pay for, or credit to obtain, with the proviso that they are to be delivered to him in the pen on a given day. If he takes "stock cattle," he gets cows, calves, and one and two year olds in equal numbers, and pays about seven dollars per head. Thus, for four hundred cattle, of which one hundred are cows, one hundred calves, one hundred year olds, and one hundred calves, one hundred year the stock cattle, of which one hundred year olds, and one hundred dollars. If he buys cows and calves he gets the same number, that is, two hundred cows and their two hundred calves for the same money, which is still a better purchase on the whole than the other. He now fixes upon a brand for the hip or shoulder, and a mark for the ear, and has them recorded in the county records. [Now he gets his branding iron, (perhaps the initials of his name) made by a blacksmith, sharpens up a knife for the ear-cutting, buys a good rawhide lariat, say forty feet long, with a noose in one end, builds up a fire in the pen where his cattle are collected, and with a Mexican, or some other good lariat man, and an extra hand or two, proceeds to business.

The Mexican makes a large running noose in one end of his lariat, coils the most of it up into one hand, and flings the open noose with the other, not only on to any animal he pleases, but over its head, around its horus, or catching a foot, just as he likes. The animal thus caught, is hove to the ground. Counter-branded by the first owner, (that is, branded with his brand again over orunder the old brand,) and then branded with the brand of the purchaser—the earmark, altered with the knife—and then let up. After the whole herd has undergone the same operation—the purchase being thus legally completed—the cattle are again turned at liberty, or driven away, according as they have been purchased, where they ar for the flerce, strong jaws and sharp teeth of a wolf. My own dogs are pure blood Scotch (Coly; one of which, not weighing twenty pounds, closed in for a fight with a full-grown bear; but a single pressure of old Bruin's pondorous jaws upon each side of the little early neck, laid poor Wallace out, and left him a wounded invalid for three months after. He liked bears no better, but gave them a wider berth after that.

The sagacity of the shepherd dog is wonderful. He is not treated as a dog, but is talked to and ordered about exactly as though he were a child. He understands it all, and obeys either the voice or the sign exactly. By day he accompanies the flock, keeps them to gether, drives them in, catches single sheep as bidden, and keeps off intruders. At night he sleeps by the fold, and seems always awake and in motion. I have seen a little half-grown pup go alone and untold into the thickets, hunt up and drive carefully out, and to the pen, a little stray lamb, that nobody knew was lost.

It is an old saying, that "the more you whip a dog the better he likes you." Shepherd dogs disprove it entirely. One that is often wiipped is spoiled. It makes him sneaking, obstituate, and worthless. And I would discharge the best shepherd that ever followed a flock upon the hills of Scotland, if he insisted upon whipping his dog for every fault, especially when training him. And now we will take a look at

THE CATTLE.

One who intends to raise stock in connection when training him. And now we will take a look at THE CATTLE.

One who intends to raise stock in connection with farming (corn and grain raising,) may settle anywhere north of the Colorado, and west of the belt of post-oaks, that runs up through Bastrop, Burleson, Milam, and Falls counties, and so on farther north, so he shuns the Blackjack and Landy post-oak lands, and looks out to get plenty of good water and rail timber, near enough for fencing. But, connected with farming, stock-growing never assumes the dimensions, nor yields the profit that it does in the purely stock country, where no tarming is done. So he who intends to make the most of cattle-growing, should go west of the Colorado, and from there to the Rio Grande he can hardly go amiss. Of course, he will avoid regions closely settled, and seek for large, open country; and then secure good water, with rails enough for pens, and wood enough for the fire. If he can put his cabin and pens upon the south side of a plece on mose side for summer range, and woode anough for the fire. If he can put his cabin and pens upon the south side of a plece on meeting has been been southed to the pens, and wood enough for the fire. If he can put his cabin and pens upon the south side of a plece on meeting has been southed an entirely open country; the the green on the side for summer range, and wooded hills or river bottom on the other for winter.

It is better also to have broad, open prairies on one side for summer range, and wooded hills or river bottoms in storms, and will seather much less than in entirely open country, the the green of the hills and bottoms in storms, and will seather much less than in entirely open country the the green of the hills and bottoms in storms, and will seather much less than in entirely open country the the green of the hills and bottoms in storms, and will seather much less than in entirely open country the head of the profit has no schedulers.
