THE MAMMOTH FOUND IN AN ICEBERG

upon his monster, and four days afterwards passed since Schumacher found the dead and imbedded in the ice. He rowed home again, getting to shore, he had before him done—namely, a portion of one of the huge blocks and parts of the side.

The fifth year he had better luck. The mammoth was warmer, and the ice was under the mammoth, and had pressed on the huge bulk through the long winters and seasons of so many repeated centuries.

Schumacher did not die so soon as his brother hunters had foretold, and seeing that he had not only recovered from his illness, but that his family were all well, he reveling in the profit he had made of the tusks of the monster, they also in turn went to visit it, and cut off enough flesh from the mammoth to feed their dogs upon during the winter.

With a mingled feeling of curiosity and fear, he walked among the blocks of ice until he came to the foot of a rock, this he climbed, thinking he might obtain a better view of the frozen-up and gigantic monster.

Spring came, and there were many hungry mouths to fill, but little to fill them with—so the old hunter launched his boat once more, kissed and bade his family goodbye, then pushed off again for the peninsula of Tana, in the hope that during the long winter months the stormy old sea might have tossed out of its deep and for ever hidden treasure-houses a few more of the bleached bones of the extinct monsters of the early world.
