C. Donnelly, of South Main street, Lehigh, who owns a large barn, destroyed by fire last Sunday morning, announces that he has determined to bring action against the water company for $1,500 damages for the loss of his barn.

Mr. Donnelly says the members of the fire department who were engaged in fighting the fire, and over a score of spectators have expressed the opinion that lack of a proper supply of water was responsible for the destruction of the barn. It will be interesting to see if the water company lowered the gates at night, thereby reducing the pressure.

Mr. Donnelly will be at Wilkes-Barre yesterday and engaged counsel to conduct the suit. This, so far as is known, is the first action of the kind that has been brought in this county, and the case will attract considerable attention.

Miss Ella O'Malley attended the social that was held in Pittston at the High School almost last evening.

RED THE BABY'S COLOR.

Shoes, Coats and Gowns All Show This Bright Color Now.

One of the innumerable attractive pictures which the streets of a large city are perpetually offering to the public eye—they are dissolving views, to be sure, but while they last they are charming—was seen the other day when a 4-year-old boy, tired by his mother's conversational delay with a friend, hung upon her skirts and nestled there unusually in a way that was probably prettier to look at than to experience. He was very fair, with short flaxen curls, and he wore a red and white striped sailor suit, with knee breeches, and short white socks that left his legs bare. His blouse had a wide red collar and red cuffs, and a red straw collar had slipped to the back of his cherubic little head. A prettier costume for a small boy could not have been devised.

Red is much used for children. Babies who can just walk go toddling along by the nurse's side in minute red shoes that must add greatly to the delight of exercising the newly acquired accomplishment, or they wear little scarlet coats or full gowns of soft red cashmere. Kilt suits for tiny boys are made of white linen duck and trimmed with red duck and are worn with short red socks. These kilt suits may also be found trimmed with light and dark blue.

The custom of dressing nurses in any uniform except the modest white muslin apron and cap has attained no foothold in this country, although abroad, except in Great Britain, children's nurses are often clothed in the most brilliant and fantastic garments—a highly decorated cap, with wide colored streamers hanging to the bottom of the skirt, and an ample circular of equally vivid tint. At intervals a vision of this sort glorifies American streets, but it is recognized at once as an exotic nurse who has been brought here by a recently arrived foreign family.

The little girl of whose frock a picture is given was in charge of one of these brightly dressed maids. The child's gown was of light blue velveteen, trimmed with three bands of white insertion, applied in points on the skirt. The round collar and cuffs in the waist under a black sash, the ends of which were trimmed with white lace.
