His High Spirted Horse Causes Him to Become a Defendant in Court.

Daniel Kelliher yesterday began an action against Joseph Meyers, of Mt. to recover $10,000. He is repre sented by Attorney M. A. McGinley. On Sept. 15 last Mr. Meyers came to this city and after filling up with a variety of liquors, so it is alleged, began to speed his horse along Washington avenue. At Phelps street he lost control of the animal and it left Washington avenue and dashed along Phelps street until near Mr. Kelliher's property

Then the horse took possession of the sidewalk and an instant later ran into Mr. Kelliher's front yard. That gentle man was sitting on his front porch and the horse trampled on him and inflicted broken ribs and other injurie of a permanent character. Meyers was thrown out and injured somewhat and was taken to the Lackawanna hospital for repairs. It is alleged that Meyers was responsible for the accident from the fact that he was not in condition to drive a high spirited horse at the time,

"What do you want with a nickel?"
"I'm hungry." She had no time to say more, for a dime was placed in her hand and the kind-faced man disappeared. The girl brought from the depths of her pocket a knotted and dirty handkerchief, to which was fas-tened a ball of gum. She thrust the tum in her mouth, and, while her thin they were never so busy. It was 3.45 o'clock. The thin jaws stopped a moment in their rapid munching, and after a lingering look up the street the girl curried toward Franklin avenue and disappeared into Raymond court. As she entered the sitting room of a mall dwelling which was plainly but omfortably furnished a man was about to pass outward. He had a din- and the pillar. His chest was caught ner pail in his hand, wore a pair of blue overalls and a checked jumper and appeared like almost any one of a hundred happy mechanics you meet on the his home in the mine ambulance medstreets. Apparently he was starting for work and was the girl's father. He arrived and advised the family to prespoke a few kindly words to her and pare for the young man's death. left the house. A woman was engaged about the kitchen. She looked up as and about 20 years old, the girl entered and asked:

"Aren't you a little late coming from chool today Alice?" "Yes, just a little. We had to stay for exercises," said the plaintive lit-

He was a pretty man-oh, so pretty. with his bell-shaped prince albert coat, creased trousers of grayish color, silk tile set squarely and correctly over hair parted painfully in the middle, knotted stick, yellow gloves and a dainty knot of violets in his court lapel. And he did look so blithe, debonair and proper as he minced across court house square toward Spruce street and Washington avenue. Everybody looked twice at the sweet thing.

"Well, I'll be blowed," thought the policeman. "Isn't he just too swell for anything."

"Huly gee, git onter de dude," said

"Humph!" grunted the solid business

"Oh, isn't he out of sight," said the factory girl. "What a soft mark he'd make," observed the gambler. Apparently oblivious to the comments he created, the pretty man had reached the curb just as a stylish equippage whirled into the avenue from Spruce street. The pretty man minced along and raised his hat to the pretty girl in the carriage-but, alas! He had unknowingly stepped off the curb into a sea of black and muddy water spread like a trap over a bottom of slippery ice. In trying to recover his balance the pretty man fell. He emerged from his bath in time to see the pretty girl lace kerchief to him.

Recking with muck and wet and lookng more like a sea monster than a howling swell he hurried over to Sanderson's, accompanied by the gibes or sympathies of a hundred spectators. A cab soon rattled up to the corner and bore away the sweet thing who had merely figured in one of the ordinary things one sees "about town."

It is a curious fact that among Scranton's clever story tellers few men spin a better yarn than City Solicitor Torey, who, nevertheless, is not on the list of bon vivants. Among Mr. Torrey's intimates, his faculty for telling story and telling it well is well known He is humorous rather than witty and never has to resort to the subterfuge of saying in advance how really funny his story is and then follow up his advantage by laughing himself in order to encourage the mirth of his hearers. His rank as a story teller is due to his methods. He sticks close to the wheat and brings out prominently all the fine points without bothering with the chaff and side issues. His snap shot stories are evidently outlined before he begins, because he seldom finds it necessary to repeat a phrase or a word.

One of the best stories Mr. Torrey over told was at the last New England | Dalton banquet, where he forced the feasters to the extremity of laughing so long and so loud that it was several minutes before he could continue his speech. Here is the story in outline, but unfortunately lacking in Mr. Torrey's oncise and inimitable phraseology:

"Out in a new but growing Pennsyl vania backwoods district a native was assessed $8 for harboring a goat-the said goat having strong and pushing proclivities. The native thought the assessment unjust and sought the learned counsel of an old justice of the peace of Irish extraction. The old. Irish official searched long and diligent-
