(These short serial stories are copyrighted by Bacheller, Johnson & Bacheller, and are printed in The Tribune by special arrangement, simultaneous with their appearance in the leading daily journals of the large cities).

CHAPTER I.

On the 17th of March, 1878, Mr. Gustave Prineveau was shot and killed in his private conveyance while returning from a drive with his wife. It was about five o'clock in the afternoon, and the carriage at the time was between Sixty-sixth and Sixty-seventh streets on Fourth avenue, in New York.

Mr. Prineveau was seated on the left of his wife in the carriage, which was a two-seated phaeton, and was driven by their man, John Teedson, who sat on the seat in front of them. Mr. Prineveau, who was sixty-three, died almost instantly, and the post mortem, held the next morning at ten o'clock, showed that he had been killed by a pistol bullet that had entered his heart at the fifth intercostal space, glanced upward and severed the aosta. A small hole was found in his vest on the left side corresponding to the bullet.

The post-mortem examination was a long one. As it was impossible for either of the other occupants of the carriage to have got round to the left side of Mr. Prineveau so as to have inflicted the wound without accomplishing an unprecedented feat, that would have been seen, and as there was no assignable motive for such an act, the whole purpose of the examination was directed to finding out what incentive some other person might have had to commit the deed.

The following facts were then elicited:

Mr. Prineveau had been married a little less than five years to a woman who, previous to that marriage, had been known as the widow of a South American merchant who had died while on a visit to Buenos Ayres. At the time of Mr. Prineveau's marriage he was reported to be very wealthy, having amassed a fortune in coal speculations in Pennsylvania and New York.

He, too, had been previously married, by which marriage there had been two sons, one of whom had died three years before the father, in California, and the other of whom was still living somewhere in Ohio. The only other relation that could be traced was a nephew, Jared Clarkson, about 28 years old, who was a scapegrace, and had lived for several years upon the bounty of Mr. Prineveau, but whose whereabouts at the time of Mr. Prineveau's death could not be ascertained.

It was shown that the deceased had been a man of singularly weak character in the management of his estate; that he gave away vast sums of money, was easily frightened or cajoled, and that from all accounts his wife's advice and influence alone saved him from many foolish speculations and misfortunes in his old age. Among his papers were found receipts for over one hundred thousand dollars signed by unknown persons and covering the four years immediately preceding his death. His relations with his wife had always been of the most amiable and trustful kind. None of the servants knew of his ever having quarreled with her. Mrs. Prineveau looked after all his personal comforts, was continually solicitous about his health, accompanied him everywhere, and bore the reputation of being a discreet domestic woman with an obvious affection for a man who was twenty years her senior.

There was in his house on Fifth avenue a servant who had been with them for five years—her name was Rose Kenny, and she testified that about a week before the murder Mr. Prineveau had been visited at night by the nephew Clarkson, whom she had let in, and who was seen by Mr. Prineveau in the library, a small room in the wing at the rear of the house. From appearance she thought the man had been drinking. He wore a rough and soiled overcoat and an imitation astrakan cap pulled over his face. He stayed over half an hour in the library, and she heard him from the front parlor speaking in loud and angry tones. She admitted that she had listened, and swore that she heard him say: "Then look out for yourself, for you will not live to accomplish it." To which the old man in a soft voice made some kind of appealing reply.

This was about ten o'clock at night, and Mrs. Prineveau, who had gone to a concert at Steinway hall with a party of friends, had not returned. She came back at ten minutes of eleven, and, upon making inquiries of the maid, Rosy, learned these facts and showed a good deal of indignation because Mr. Prineveau had been subjected to the annoyance of a worthless and reckless scapegrace.

Mrs. Prineveau herself corroborated this statement explicitly, but could give very little information about the habits or antecedents of Clarkson, except that she had learned incidentally from her husband that he was a drunkard with a wife and two children, and, owing to his dissolute habits, had never been able to take care of himself or his family.

It was also learned that on the afternoon of the 14th of March Clarkson had been seen by the coachman hanging about the house, and the hall boy, who had been sent on an errand, encountered him on the corner and was there held in conversation by him, Clarkson asking him, among other things, if Mr. Prineveau did not take a drive usually in the afternoons.

These bits of testimony led to the police efforts to find Clarkson. Mr. Prineveau was buried in the Trinity cemetery on the 19th. His funeral was attended by many old New Yorkers, and public attendtion was turned to the efforts made by Mrs. Prineveau to discover the perpetrator of the crime.

On the 21st Clarkson's wife and children were found in a miserable lodging place in Varick street. But Clarkson had disappeared. His wife promptly acknowledged that he had come home late on the afternoon of the 17th, had hurriedly changed his clothes and gone out. She had not seen him or heard of him since. But she strenuously denied that he had committed a crime, and refused to be influenced by any of the damaging circumstances.

Here the affair threatened to end, as so many others of its kind have ended, in idle curiosity, police inefficiency and ultimate forgetfiness. But on the 23d Clarkson was discovered in hiding in Troy. He was brought here and lodged in the city prison, and then it became known to the public that the police had found in the rooms of Mrs. Clarkson in Varick street a small French revolver with five chambers, one of which was empty, and the bullets of this pistol corresponded in size with the one taken from the body of Mr. Prineveau.

THE REASONS WHY

Scott's Emulsion of Cod-liver Oil and Hypophosphites is so useful in all wasting diseases, such as Consumption, Anæmia, Scrofula, Rheumatism, Bronchitis, and Marasmus and Rickets in children, is because it furnishes to the depleted blood the fattening and enriching properties of the oil, and to the bones and nervous system the phosphorescent and vitalizing properties of the Hypophosphites, which together nourish the body arrest the progress of the disease, and commence a process of repair that finally means restored health and vigor.
