His military comrades felt more deeply than outward show the loss He Gave a Midnight Robber a Smash on sustained in his death.

After 1 o'clock yesterday afternoon persons began to arrive at the house, 214 Mulberry street. Adjutant Millar and Captain Chase were on guard and at an early hour yesterday morning was only relatives and friends were admitted. The body reposed in the center of the front parlor, the head of the black casket facing to the southeast. The shroud was Captain Kellow's full regimental suit; the right hand was crossed over the breast and wore a white glove. On the left breast hung and exclaimed, "Hand that stuff over pendant the many badges of distinction earned during his brilliant career on the battlefield and as a marksman of the home guard. The lower half of the casket was covered with a folded flag, on which were placed the sword, belt and cap of the deceased.

The Floral Offerings.

Following the hearse came Company R acting as an escort, in command of Lieutenant Kanbeck. On the march to the church the carriages of the pallbearers, flower-bearers and mourners followed the company, and then the members of Griffin post. Colonel Ripple and staff came next and then came other members of the regiment and veterans of Company B. The employes of the Delaware, Lackawanna and Westtern car shops marched ahead of the carriages of the city officials and councilmen. "Jesus, Lover of My Soul," was played by the drum corps. The standards of Griffin post were draped in mourning and so were the flags of the post and regiment. Arriving at Elm Park church Com-pany B stacked arms on Jefferson avenue. Inside the church sentinels were on duty and the front seats in the center were reserved for the members of the military. Griffin post sat to the right and city officials and councilmen to the left. felt in the city, and arguments are heard in all directions that after the depression of the past two years there must of necessity be a reaction, the prelude of which has already appeared. Whether this is a certainty must be determined by men who are in a position o give a definite and reliable opinion. In Scranton much depends on the suc cessful working of the mines. If the output of coal be limited then the trafhe is reduced accordingly on the railroads, and less money is expended on the roads and in purchasing the products of the iron and steel industries, and so on, until almost every industry

In the iron and steel industries it is asserted that there is no prospect of improved trade, and that no orders are anticipated which will make any mate rial improvement. Offers have been made to place orders of ample dimen sions, but payment would only be made on eight or ten months' bills, which prevented some local firms accepting the offers. There is no doubt, however, that if the railroads had increased and permanent traffic it would considerably benefit the iron and steel indus tries, as it is well known that railroad companies usually carrying thousands of kegs of spikes and large stocks o rails and supplies have now very limited stocks. During the past year less miles of road have been built than during any similar period in the past twenty years. the rolling stock has decreased, few locomotives have been purchased and the tracks have been in some instances actually neglected, consequently it is argued that when money is expended in these directions, it benefits Scranton.
