We allude to this subject at this time chiefly because the present discussion in manufactures increased from his recent and sudden disappearance per capits in 1860 to 3484 per capita from public life has not caused a change in Mr. Pattison's favorite views. He is apparently still the high-minded and platitudinous reformer who in one breath talks the language of genuine civic nobility and in the next abstract edly falls in with notorious spollsmen and bosses like Hensel and Harrity. But, then, in this marked discrepancy between profession and performance, he is probably not unique, either in politics or in private life.
