Remaine Callender, an electrical engieer, who has his office and laboratory in the Decker building, Union Square, ays the New York Tribune, the other day exhibited and gave a working demonstration there of an entirely new system of telephone exchange which he has invented and patented here and abroad. The apparatus exhibited forms complete telephone exchange in working order of a kind intended for use in a small city. The whole system of inerconnection at the exchange is autonatic, the services of operators there not being required. Subscribers make their own connections automatically by the use of a simple device attached to their transmitting and receiving instruments. By this device, when a ubscriber desires to connect himself with another subscriber he turns two knobs, moving indicator arms over two numbered dials, forming the proper combination of figures. For instance if "15" were the number desired the subscriber would move one indicator Fox was taken to the hospital, and arm to "1" and the other to "5," and within twelve seconds, Mr. Callender says, the bell on the calling subscriber's instrument would ring to announce the connection with the subscriber at "15." tion is made at the central station consists of a circuit selector for receiving calls and individualizing portions of the apparatus to the calling subscriber; of Attorney Thomas H.
