ENGLISH AND YANKEE MINES. The forthcoming annual report of Mine Inspector Hugh McDonald, of the Fifth Anthracite district, will treat at tive stocks of the New York stock marlength of the comparative loss of life in the English and American (anthracite) mining regions. cite) mining regions.

In England almost the entire amount of coal in a vein is mined and the percentage of loss or waste in the course of preparation—the English product being soft, or bituminous coal—is reduced to the minimum, as almost everything brought to the surface finds very great difference in the workmen. In England the men engaged in mining coal are skilled and experienced workmen, whose lives from the earliest years The boys of the Vulcan Iron works at which they are permitted by law to lives. In this country, however, the work of mining and preparing anthracite for the market is very largely in the hands of men of little skill or experience, ignorant of the language of the country, who have adopted this vocation because their lack of knowledge shuts them out of employment in other branches of toil in which the return for their labor in any degree approaches that received in mining.

Another difference in the mining conditions contributing greatly to the apparent disparity-and one of which the mere figures or the reports from which the statistics are quoted, take no account—is the very great dissimilarity in the veins mined and the methods of mining in use in the two countries. In thickness. In this country the anthracite measures are of much greater thickess. In the Lackawanna and Wyoming regions veins fourteen feet in thickness are common, while in the Hazleton and Schuylkill districts the mammoth vein attains in many instances thickness of seventy feet of minable powder or other explosive is used, most of the mining being done with the pick In this country powder, and in many mines, dynamite and other high explosives are used to bring down the coal.
