"During many years," said the professor, "I have devoted myself to the study of animals, not merely to the habits and traits of character generalized by the average naturalist, but to their language, their inner lives—indeed, to their psychological promptings. And I have made a specialty of the horse. You have doubtless noticed that a horse is almost constantly working his ilps while engaged at labor or while resting, and it occurred to me while resting, and it occurred to me that, in contrast with the average mor-tal, this mouth industry must mean something aside from a mere convul-sive instinct. It does—it is a sign lang-uage, and I have mastered it. I take walks among the horses, and I will now set forth the result of my

Then the professor proceeded with the following recital, which, with the exception of the technical wording so dear to the specialist, is an exact re-

A number of horses stood in a north side car barn. About the place was an air of dilapidation. In appearance the horses were not only tired and sadly worn, but seemed to be depressed by a spiritual weariness.
"Well," said the Iron Gray, bowing

"Well," said the Iron Gray, bowing somowhat stiffly to the Old Roan, "how do you feel this morning?"

"I am hardly boisterous, though I can't complain of overwork." Old Roan answered, lazily lashing at a fly that buzzed about his hocks.

"But rather of neglect," Iron Gray suggested. "I know how you feel; I know that you would rather have attention paid you, even though it might involve an imposition of labor, for there is always some satisfaction in feeling is always some satisfaction in feeling.

Old Roan sighed distressfully, reached around and sadly bit himself in the flank. "Yes," he said, "for the knowl-edge that you are a factor in the movement of the world gives more pleasure, even though attended by slavery, than could possibly be gleaned from a freedom which means neglect. What was that you were about to tell me this that you were about to tell me this do will him? Da gwine pack him down an' send him way off yander fur folks to sai. Da rid you durin' de wah an'

"Oh, something told me by one of the oldest and wisest horses in the town. He has learned to understand many of the disagreeable sounds made by man, and the other day he heard two men ralking on the front platform of a cross-town car. One of the men seemed to be much interested in discoursing upon a horseless carriage race set forth by the Timez-Herald. It is to take place on the Sheridan road."

"A horseless carriage race, did you say?"
"Yes, carriages without horses."
"You mean a bicycle race."
"No, I mean just what I say."

For a long time the Old Roan was silent and meditative. And then the troublous play of his countenance, the movement of his lips was so rapid that the professor was not able to catch his exclamations, but it was plain that his emotion was strong. He strove to calm his agitation, for being a horse he had horse sense, but it was some time before he could with proper dig-nity express himself. Finally he said:

"Settles what?" Iron Gray asked. "Settles us—our race. I am not given to a light expression of opinion. While others were talking I have remained silent—not that I was lacking in infor-mation, but because that I have ever held that those problems which most concern the horse race must be dis-cussed with slowness and gravity. I also understand many of the queer noises made by man, and I remember once that I stood outside a playhouse at night and heard a great voice shout. A horse! A horse! My kingdom for a But what would be his shout now? Would he offer to exchange his kingdom for a horse? No: you would hear him shout, 'My kingdom for a bicycle or a horseless carriage!

Iron Gray coughed: "Ah, I see that you have thought deeply. But are you wise enough to forecast the end, and have you philosophy enough to accept

"To forecast requires no wisdom," Roan replied, meditatively wiping his mouth on the edge of the trough, "and to accept it implies no philosophy." Then you think that after awhile

Don't you know that machinery is knocking out sentiment? Do you hear of any more horse and buggy courtships? Ah, they were the ships that passed in a moonlit night; they were anchored in the harbor of sweet memory, and the waves that play about them sing a sad song." The old borse was silent for a few minutes, surlying to wipe his eyes with his tail. After a time he continued: "Courtship now is a bleycle race. It is no longer intensity of wooing; it is speed. The old man and the old woman are drawn by a horse, and their old buggy rattles glong the road. They are going to church. Suddenly from behind comes a 'hi yi,' and past them whizzes the daughter and her accepted lover, the young man who won a road race. I was once the pet of a girl. About my neck she would put her arms and whisper her secrets in my ear, and at even-ing she would bring me lumps of sugar and laugh gleefully while I ate them. Yes, for us there appears to be nothing left but humiliation, and I am thank-ful that my grandfather did not live to see it. He was a soldier, and in one of the most desperate charges of the war: a flag fluttered above him. Once it drooped into his eyes; the hand that had held it had fallen. But another hand seized it, another form was in the saddle, and away my grandfather dashed wildly and proudly bearing the dashed, wildly and proudly bearing the glorified sentiment of his country.
